CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

his friends, the common people, as he climbed fame's ladder, but he seemed to cling the closer to the plain people—friends and fellow-citizens of his early life—and as years and honors were added to his eventful life, commanded more and more their respect and confidence.

As a result of Senator KYLE's parentage, education, and temperament, he was most interested in educational work and the interests of the industrial classes.

His laborious duties as chairman of the Industrial Commission, into which he threw all his splendid energies, had not a little to do with hastening his untimely death, and his strongest desire to live was actuated by a wish to complete this work.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind the life of Senator KYLE teaches a fruitful lesson and shines forth as a beacon of hope for this Republic.

His simplicity, sincerity, and honesty were forceful. To such men can the administration of this Government be safely intrusted.

The greatest safeguard of this nation lies in the fact that to such men are offered opportunities to exemplify their character to the people and imprint their handiwork on the laws of the land.

So long as men of pure lives, unselfish motives, and untiring devotion to the interests and welfare of the masses, from whom they sprung, can sit in the council chambers, the peers of any, this Government is amply safeguarded and will survive.

There are innumerable features of our governmental system of which we are justly proud, and with ample reason, but to my mind all others are of little moment compared to the fact that the plain men of simple tastes and inexpensive habits, pure and unselfish motives, are the rulers of this land.

Where one man attains high station through his riches, ten men of the stamp and mold of Senator KYLE reach equal station, and wield, man for man, infinitely greater influence in the affairs that shape our destiny.

Here, then, is the secret of the greatness and stability of this Government. As the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" contribute to our material and physical welfare, so it is such legislators as Senator KYLE who are the real men to whom our political and economical welfare is vouchsafed, and well so. Of such are the truly great.

Having been thrown among and having had to deal with politicians for many years, he was in no sense a politician, nor would he have ever become one. To him the methods of the politician were unknown and misunderstood.

He was alike frank in his politics and his business. Honest himself, he thought all men honest, trusted all men, confided in all men. To him an implied promise was as sacred as an oath, and he accepted such promises in the same spirit he gave them.

Such characteristics are usually termed weak. To my mind they are the essentials of strength.

He who is clothed in the armor of sincerity, with truth for a shield and honesty for a sword, can go forth and do battle, and him all the world can not conquer. Such a knight was JAMES HENDERSON KYLE.

Simple in his tastes, frank in all his dealings, trusting and forgiving in his nature, conspicuous in his devotion to his family, with an ability which enabled him to cope with the questions of the times with an unerring intelligence, he commanded the respect of all.

I was in his home city the day after his death, and, knowing that he had been sick, although not supposed to be seriously so, I could read his death in the face of everyone.

I never saw—I never expect to see—such an overwhelming manifestation of grief and sorrow by an entire community as I saw on this day and the day of his burial.

From his life, as exemplified by the love and sorrow of all the people, I learned a lesson never to be forgotten, and realized that the greatest of great men and the best of good men are those that are close to the people.

I realized then that the zenith of a man's glory is reached when at the noontide of his public career he can lie down to his eternal sleep, truly loved, respected, honored, and mourned by all the people—those of high estate and low.

Such a man was our dead friend.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, Hon. JAMES HENDERSON KYLE was one of the most versatile as well as one of the most liberally equipped representatives of the people in the United States Senate, considering his short term of service, in his day and generation.

His qualifications as a classical scholar, a civil engineer, a theologian, and his education for the bar gave him a theoretical knowledge that enabled him to become somewhat a shining mark among his fellows almost anywhere. With general public questions and current and political literature he was quite familiar. He was for a time instructor in mathematics and engineering in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny, Pa.; he preached in Utah and Colorado; was secretary of the Yankton College, in South Dakota; was elected to the State senate of that State in 1890 as an independent representative of the people; was elected twice as United States Senator from South Dakota; appointed by the President of the Senate as a member of the United States Industrial Commission; was elected president of the Commission, and held this post when his untimely death arrived, at the age of 47. He was not mercenary and despised the low ideals of many in high places in this money-mad age, both in the professions and in official positions.

He was not a politician in the sense that he worked up delegations and sought to precipitate himself into public place, but he was a politician in the higher sense of so equipping himself in the science of government and in a knowledge of the rights of men and in so displaying his humane feeling for his fellows that the people who knew his sterling qualities sought him as their representative. He was of that high type of the politician who are ever unselfishly trying to do something for the masses of the people. As is common with men burdened with constitutional circulatory weaknesses, he did not and could not inordinately concentrate his efforts on any given specialty. His impaired physical condition would not tolerate the strain. Biographers usually attribute the scattering of mental efforts to a love of variety or a dislike of monotony, but more generally the spreading out of mental effort is a necessity to relieve some innate weakness from a threatened collapse.

The lamented deceased realized much better than others the situation, and with courage attempted to shield the weak vital part. He had a small clot form upon his brain some time before the fatal breakdown, which was a sure admonition of what must follow. However, with discretion and courage, after the clot was absorbed, he returned, weakened, to his post and remained there until the last.

He was a model public official, honest, sympathetic, just, energetic, courageous, true, and able. Being honest himself, he devoutly believed in the honesty and good intentions of his fellows; hence he approached his colleagues with explanations and persuasive arguments rather than with accusations and abusive epithets. He was kind, generous, and charitable toward all who differed from him. There was no assumption, selfishness, egotism, or bigotry in his makeup. He utterly despised the selfish bigotry that so often permeates professional and official representatives.

He was always willing to occupy ordinary places among his associates, a real sign of worth; hence he was often exalted. Probably the most attractive attribute of this exemplary character was his sunny, generous, open, social disposition. He was a delightful conversationalist, tactful, deferential, entertaining, and a model of courtesy. His social ideas were all elevated; hence the higher type of the social circles were most congenial to him. He loved the intellectual rather than the frivolous or spectacular displays. He was temperate in all things; hence generally wise.

He possessed mental powers for high social entertainments, and was not contented with the commonplace, sensual gluttonies so common in his day. He enjoyed those most whose thoughts ran upon social subjects tending to benefit those who occupied low stations, and he was especially well versed in a knowledge of the existing evils, and he had read much and thought much about adequate remedies. He had a most profound sympathy for the unfortunate, and was ever ready to impartially hear their grievances or champion their cause. The premature death of such a one is not only a great loss to his family, friends, State, and nation, but is a real loss to humanity everywhere. The life of high ideals, the spotless private and public character, the consecration of self to the good of one's fellows are the most sacred assets of the world's civilization. Such a character as the deceased form adorable models for many generations yet to be born. Many aspiring youths, of South Dakota especially, where the precepts and examples of this well-rounded character are so impressed upon the people, will imitate the worthy footsteps of this lamented one to the continuing honor and glory of the race.

While we sadly deplore his untimely death, we may all benefit by the beautiful example of his well-spent life.

Mr. MCCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to know Senator KYLE well, but I knew him well enough to respect and honor him.

This morning, on my way to this Hall, remembering the courteous invitation of yourself to say a few words in honor of our departed friend, the earth bright with sunshine, the air fragrant with the perfume of flowers and melodious with the song of birds, it seemed strange to think of death and the dead. And yet, here within our sight one desk is draped for one lately a member of this House and from two other desks the drapery of death has just been removed. We are impressed again with the fact that "in the midst of life we are in death."

If our friend were to whisper his wish at this time, I am sure he would say "There could be no better time than this to speak of me. This is the springtime. The winter has passed and life is renewed." He would say, "Look at the trees and their leaves, and see there the symbol of human hope. In the springtime come forth the buds like the hopes of youth. Later we see the tree in full foliage, the hopes of manhood fully developed. Later comes the time when, one by one, those leaves do fall like the passing away of hopes among men. We walk through the woods in the autumn; our feet stir the leaves that have fallen suggestive of hopes unrealized. Yet those fallen leaves ministered to the life of the tree through the heat of summer, just as the hopes of youth sustain the lives of men." And, Mr. Speaker, he would say to us further, remembering the ministry from which he came, "I trust, my brethren, that after the storms of life have passed there will yet remain at the top of the tree one leaf pointing skyward. If you have that hope, you may indeed be called blessed."

The first time I heard of our departed friend was when he was chosen to the United States Senate. The singular thing about it was that he was chosen from the ministry. I had not within my recollection heard of such a case before. I did not understand it. I came to understand it later. I heard then the story of that Fourth of July oration in 1891. The regular speaker expected for the occasion had failed to come. The minister was called upon, and he so fully voiced the thought of those who heard him that they said, "That man is the one whom we desire to have represent us in our State legislature, in the senate." And to that position they called him.

Later, and again without solicitation, as I understand, he was called to the broader field of the United States Senate. If I understand our friend at all, Mr. Speaker—and from several conversations I had with him I think I do—he felt justified in coming from the sacred desk to the desk of legislation. Trained as he was and believing as he did, it was not hard for him to see in this a call to duty different in form but the same in essence—the service of his fellow-man. And in that spirit he met and discharged his duties here. It is the spirit which sanctifies every relation of life. It made him a loyal friend, a faithful public servant, a devoted son, a loving husband and father.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, by order of the House, this time is set apart for tributes to the life and public career of JAMES H. KYLE, late a Senator from South Dakota.

I have read that, time out of mind, in the earliest civilization which is of record, the Egyptians thought it wise, to preserve the morality and practices of the people, to institute a law requiring the "trial of the dead." The men followed the hearse, casting dust upon their heads; the women chanted mournful dirges until they reached the banks of a lake directly in front of the place of sepulcher. The body, which had been specially prepared, was placed in front of the court, made up of 42 judges. A great crowd was usually assembled. There floated the boat, and within it stood Charon, the ferryman, waiting to hear the sentence of the court.

It was in the power of any man to then and there accuse the departed before the body could be borne across. If the charge was held to be proven, the body was denied burial in consecrated ground and the crowd silently went away. If the judgment was "not guilty," the accuser suffered the penalty of the crime alleged. The relatives glorified the life, and the people joined in the chorus proclaiming the virtues of the departed. The coffin was placed in the boat with great ceremony and was covered with flowers. The priest read the order for the burial of the dead and the family adorned the tomb.

Down through the ages, carried by the inertia of custom, we can yet see the embalming of the dead, the mourners, the tombstones, and the flowers. We can yet hear the chants and the offices for the dead. The 42 judges became the foundation of the grand-jury system, passing on the acts of the living instead of the dead. A maxim was written in the law books, "that death having closed the lips of one, the law sealed the lips of the other." One who spoke by authority had said, "Judge not, that ye be not judged." It had been written "that when the books of record were opened the dead would be judged out of those things written in the books according to their works." Humanity now, with meekness, leaves the judgment of the dead to the Father of us all.

And so this day, perhaps within the shadow of this ancient custom, we stop and pay tribute to the character and influence of the life that has gone out. Not as a relative, not as a perfunctory duty, but as a living expression from the heart of a friend, each of us attempts in a feeble way to point out the lesson of the life of our former colleague. When I began my service here, among the first Senators that I met was Mr. KYLE, of South Dakota, a fine specimen of physical manhood, with winning ways. From an adjoining State, I went over many matters with him which appeared to be of interest to the great Northwest. He had been on the frontier and so had I; we had had common experiences.

Along his chosen political lines he was a faithful and energetic worker. A new State, made up of prairie, range, and hills, makes many demands upon its Senators, and he shouldered up to his task like one who desired to do a full day's work.

I was glad to be his friend, although not in accord with all of his political views. Therein lies the strength of our institutions. We can differ and still respect the convictions of others. He had great force of character; had carved his own way—student, minister, State senator, and United States Senator. His life shows the possibilities of this country of ours. We honor ourselves, we honor this Hall, when we stop the work and grind and pay just tribute to a good man who has gone to his reward, and certainly in that class belonged Senator JAMES H. KYLE.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Senator KYLE the State of South Dakota mourns a faithful representative; his family has lost a devoted husband and father, and the Senate of the United States an honorable and honored member. He was stricken down in the midst of his labors, before reaching the meridian of life. And yet, if we measure his life by events and deeds, instead of the passing years, his was a full and well-rounded career.

> We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
> In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
> We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
> Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Senator KYLE was but 47 years of age at the time of his death. He had spent ten years in the pursuit of higher and professional education, taking courses in civil engineering, the classics, and theology, besides studying law; nearly ten years in the Christian ministry in Congregational churches in Utah and South Dakota, and ten years in the Senate of the United States.

From the farm to the highest legislative body in the world. This is the epitome of his life. This is a transformation common in the history of our country. The sons of toil, the lads from the farm, the workshop, and the homes of laboring men are the boys who have come forth from generation to generation to accomplish the great things in the trades and the professions, and to make the greatest of American statesmen. This is one of the beneficent results of our democratic institutions, which recognize in every man the political equal of every other man, and, as far as possible, assure to each an equal opportunity in the race of life.

I first saw Senator KYLE in 1891 during the session of the State legislature that elected him to his first term in the Senate. From that time his career was familiar to all citizens of South Dakota; but I did not become personally well acquainted with him until the last year of his life. I shall not forget the cordiality with which he greeted me when I came here a new member to attend the closing days of the Fifty-sixth Congress, nor the many acts of fraternal consideration performed by him during the few months while we were in public station together. He was manly, openhearted, and generous, extending and inviting gentlemanly confidence.

Born in Ohio and educated in Ohio and Illinois, he found the natural field of his active labors in the trans-Mississippi and intermountain West. He was a self-educated man. By this is not meant that he did not have the advantage of a college education, but that he earned the means to carry him through college and the professional school by working in vacations and by intervals of teaching. American history is rich in examples of boys who have worked their way through college, thus learning their first great lesson in the mastery of difficulties, preparing themselves for greater conflicts and victories in the later experiences of life. Senator KYLE belonged to that class of self-educated men who, born with pure purposes and high ambitions, mark out a noble career for themselves, and then prepare for it with indomitable zeal, overcoming all obstacles. He equipped himself with the aids of a collegiate education, and then continued to improve his educational opportunities throughout his life.

We have no evidence that he had planned a public or political career for himself. His sense of duty had led him to choose the Christian ministry for his life work. He entered public life during a period of political unrest and at the solicitation of his neighbors and friends, who had confidence in his ability and character. Senator KYLE was not a party man. He was by nature a reformer. Possessed of high ideals, he sought their accomplishments by whatever seemed to him the most practical and available means. Such a man is not always understood, particularly by those who feel deeply the force of party ties and who look to party organizations as the natural and necessary means of political progress.

It was a most appropriate assignment that placed him in charge of the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. No two topics in our complex modern life were of greater interest to him than these. His studies and tastes prepared him especially for this position. He held this chairmanship eight years, and until his death.

When the Industrial Commission was appointed by President McKinley in 1898 Senator KYLE was made its chairman. The work of this Commission was right in line with his previous labors and he was specially equipped for it. The work of the Commission was of a most laborious character. It is believed that Senator KYLE's devotion to this task permanently impaired his health and was one of the causes resulting in his death. The compilation of the investigations of the Commission embrace some 19 volumes, many of which are already published. The work of Senator KYLE as chairman of this Commission constitutes his most important public service. The value of these investigations will be more and more appreciated by the entire nation as the years go by. The Industrial Commission was one of the most important commissions of this generation.

The problems the solution of which is to be assisted by the investigations of this Commission are among the most difficult problems of this industrial age—the relations of capital and labor and the relations of each to the Constitution and the laws of the country—how the interests of each may be fostered and advanced without injury to the rights of the other and consistent with the best good of the Commonwealth. The best contribution that can be made to any great problem is a clear presentation of the facts involved. The most serious and acrimonious disputes over industrial and political questions are based upon an imperfect or inadequate knowledge of the facts. When the real facts are once clearly understood the problem is more than half solved. The volumes of the Industrial Commission will make a permanent addition to the industrial library of our country, and will probably furnish the most important single aid in the solution of our industrial problems.

Senator KYLE was an ardent believer in the rights of the individual. In the shaping of legislation his instincts naturally led him to watch closely the possible encroachments of organized industries, and to jealously safeguard the interests of the individual operator or laborer. In this he was in line with the more progressive of modern statesmen. The evolution of human government, indeed, is the development of the rights of the many as distinguished from the rights of the few. Until the beginning of modern history the many came into their inheritance of toil but not of opportunity. There was a time when but few men were masters of themselves, and they were also masters of others. To-day slavery is not tolerated in the civilized world. For a long period in history the spiritual interests of the many were dominated by the spiritual imperialism of the few. To-day religion and the development of the spiritual life are subjects for the individual soul and the individual conscience. For many generations more knowledge, limited and imperfect as it was, was likewise the exclusive property of the few. It was doled out to the people in small quantities, and with modifications and adulterations. To-day, in America, knowledge is disseminated to the humblest homes, and is the birthright of every citizen.

Senator KYLE had not a feigned but a genuine interest in the welfare of the common people. In the ministry, as in the Senate, he devoted himself to what he believed to be their best interests. A man of correct life and high ideals himself, he sought to elevate the standards of American life as it is lived by the great body of the people. A man with such aims and efforts can never live in vain. He passes on and disappears from the familiar places, but his name and his memory abide, like the lingering fragrance of sweet flowers, a benediction and an inspiration to those who knew him best.

Mr. MARTIN. I move the adoption of the resolutions presented by my colleague; and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who were to have participated in these eulogies to-day, may have leave to print remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the resolutions which have been submitted; and, pending that question, the gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that leave to print be given to certain members he has named. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question is now upon the adoption of the resolutions.

The question was taken; and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

And in pursuance thereof the House (at 3 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

TESTIMONY, ETC., IN APPELLATE COURTS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3153) to amend section 698 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to report it back favorably without amendment; and I ask that the bill may be now considered. Before the bill is read for information I should like to make one statement which Senators will have in mind when they hear it.

It is simply a bill to provide that the practice which prevails now in many States may prevail in the Federal courts, that instead of sending up copies in all cases of records, minutes of testimony, etc., to the appellate court, which is a very costly and cumbrous process, the original papers shall be sent up and returned after the appellate court has acted on the case. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate in full.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. HOAR. Let it go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama objects, and the bill goes to the Calendar.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that on and after the passage of this act the per diem pay of all persons employed in any court of the United States, under section 715 of the Revised Statutes, shall be $3 a day instead of $2 a day, as now provided by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPECIAL EMBASSIES AT CORONATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. BAILEY on Saturday, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That it is contrary to the policy of the United States to accredit to any foreign government any ambassador, minister, or other diplomatic officer or agent to especially represent the United States at the coronation of any hereditary prince or potentate.

2. That no power exists in the President of the United States to appoint any ambassador, minister, or other diplomatic officer or agent and accredit him as the representative of the United States to any foreign government except by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as prescribed in section 2, Article II, of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire, as a parliamentary inquiry, first to ask what will be the disposition of this resolution if no Senator desires at this time to address the Senate upon it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would go to the Calendar; but on motion it can be taken up at any time from the Calendar or by unanimous consent it can lie on the table.

Mr. TELLER. Let us get a vote on it.

Mr. BAILEY. What I desired to know was, if no Senator now wishes to address the Senate, whether it is not before the Senate for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is before the Senate for a vote.

Mr. BAILEY. I am very much more anxious to have a vote upon it than I am to make a speech upon it, and I am ready to take the vote. I am ready to take the vote, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that it be read before we vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read.

Mr. FORAKER. Is the Senator from Texas specially desirous of having the resolution considered at this time? I have not read the resolution. I heard it read when it was presented by the Senator from Texas last Saturday, and it occurred to me as it was read that it was a very broad resolution, and that I should like to look at it before I voted upon it. Perhaps I ought to have done so, but I have been very busily occupied with another matter.

Mr. BAILEY. I take it there is but one word in the resolution that by any reasonable possibility might be considered as too broad, and that is the word "agent." But the Senator from Ohio will observe, by carefully reading the resolution, that it is only an agent of the Government whose appointment is forbidden without the advice and consent of the Senate, and not the mere agent of the President, which in many instances he has the right to employ. I think even that word can not be objected to in this connection.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio that all I desire is to have a vote. I am unwilling that the resolution shall be buried. I believe that that is not the practice in the Senate. My understanding is that, after a full and fair debate, the Senate is always willing to take an expression on any bill or any resolution.

With the assurance that we can have that vote, I am perfectly willing that this matter shall pass until any Senator can have time to examine it, and until the Senator from Ohio shall have an opportunity to address the Senate upon it, but I can only consent to that, of course, with the understanding that we can have a vote upon it at some time during this session.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Texas has said about what I would have expected him to say under such circumstances. As I understand it, it is simply a resolution expressing an opinion; it is not now attached to any bill; it will have the same effect if it be voted upon later in the session that it would have if voted upon to-day. It is a resolution that I should be glad to look at before we vote upon it. I heard some remarks made about the amendment that the Senator offered the other day which I did not fully agree with, and I thought at the time that I would make some remarks; but when this resolution was submitted I supposed it would go over until there would be an opportunity to investigate the matter and talk intelligently. If it is all the same to the Senator, I should be glad to have the resolution go over. I assure him I shall not delay taking it up and voting upon it.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution shall retain its place on the table as it is without going to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent that the resolution lie on the table, retaining its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2336) granting a pension to Rebecca Coppinger, which was, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twelve" and insert "eight."

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

ARIVELLA D. MEEKER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1305) for the relief of Mrs. Arivella D. Meeker.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 4, after "Colorado," to strike out down to and including the word "cents," in line 6, and insert "an annuity of $500 per annum for her life, commencing on the 15th day of June, 1900."

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

MORALS OF JESUS OF NAZARETH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed and bound, by photolithographic process, with an introduction of not to exceed 25 pages, to be prepared by Dr. Cyrus Adler, librarian of the Smithsonian Institution, for the use of Congress, 9,000 copies of Thomas Jefferson's Morals of Jesus of Nazareth, as the same appears in the National Museum, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 6,000 copies for the use of the House.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3123) to make Port Arthur, Tex., a subport of entry and delivery in the customs district of Galveston was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 10172) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Finegan was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 12097) to amend the internal-revenue laws in regard to storekeepers and gaugers was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2295.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, so far as the details of this bill are concerned, I shall probably say but very little, if anything at all. There are two reasons for this. In the first place, I am not a member of the Philippine Committee and have not had the benefit of the hearings before the committee, and I have not had the benefit of the consultations in the committee and have not had the benefit of participating in the labor of the committee in framing this measure. Therefore, while I have read the bill, and read it carefully, as I think, and have studied its provisions sufficiently to be satisfied with them, yet I recognize that the members of the committee are necessarily better qualified than I am to answer the criticisms which have been made, or may be made, upon some of the provisions of the bill, and for that reason, a sufficient one of itself, I pass by the discussion of the various provisions of the measure.

But the other reason I have, to which I have referred, is a more important and a more commanding reason why I should do this. It is found, Mr. President, in the fact that the opponents of this measure have given to this discussion so wide a range that it comprehends the entire Philippine problem. This was indicated in one of the first sentences of the first speech made in this debate by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], when he stated that in this controversy the real issue is not this bill, but the policy of which it is an exponent. The Senator, after making that statement, then proceeded to make a very elaborate speech, and I can say in all good conscience, so far as its literary quality is concerned and so far as it is concerned as an intellectual effort, it was a great speech. I do not think I have ever read a speech with more entertainment than I read that one, although I do not agree with a single proposition or view advanced by the Senator.

And yet, notwithstanding I can say all that in compliment of his speech, the fact remains that when you come to analyze it and apply it to the measure which we have under consideration it divides itself into four divisions or chapters or propositions. In the first place, in this first division, if I may so term it, the Senator addresses himself to the proposition that our policy in acquiring and undertaking to govern the Philippine Islands is a mistaken and wicked policy. He used more extravagant language than that, but the words I have employed will indicate what he meant. It is a mistaken and wicked policy, he said, for which only the Republicans are responsible.

His second proposition was that our policy in acquiring and governing the Philippine Islands is a mistaken and wicked policy, for which the Democrats are not responsible. His third proposition was that as to the Philippines we have no policy whatever, and he concludes his remarks in that connection with a demand that we shall at once adopt and declare and define some policy.

The fourth division of his speech is but an impassioned outcry about thieves and robbers and pirates and plunderers and other pleasant people of that kind connected with declarations about cruelty and barbarism and butchery and murder and bloody ruin.

The Senator very naturally concludes, as the result of all this, that we ought to retire at once from the Philippines, or as soon, at least, as we can get out of them.

Other speeches have been made in opposition to this measure, very able ones, notably, without meaning to disparage anybody else, the speeches made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. In so far as they talked about general questions they were all of the same general character as the speech of the Senator from Tennessee to which I have referred.

And so it is, Mr. President, that I say we have the whole Philippine problem opened up by this debate, and the first question for us to address ourselves to is not what shall be the provisions of a bill, but whether or not we shall have any bill at all; for in view of what has been said, if we are to consider it seriously, necessarily the first question is whether we intend to remain in the Philippines or come away from the Philippines, as Senators speaking in opposition have suggested we should do, and demand that we should do.

If we are to come away immediately, or this year, or next year, or at any time in the near future, it is not very important, Mr. President, whether we enact this bill or not, for until that time we can continue to get along as we have been getting along, with military rule supplemented with such civil government as the Taft Commission can supply. But if we are to remain in the Philippines indefinitely—if we are to remain there, for instance, until we shall have suppressed all opposition to our authority, until we shall have established law and order throughout the length and breadth of that archipelago, until we shall have established a stable government, and shall have set it into successful operation, and shall have put the feet of that people into the path that leads to more enlightened knowledge and greater happiness and greater prosperity and a higher civilization—it is of the utmost importance that we should pass either this bill or some other bill like it. It is important because the time of withdrawal will be indefinite. We must stay there much longer than has been suggested by anybody on the other side, whether we ultimately come away or not; and important also because military government is inconsistent, generally speaking, with the spirit of our institutions, and it is obnoxious to the people who are to be governed.

So it is, Mr. President, that the first great question for us to consider is whether we intend to stay for this indefinite period, for we need not consider more than that, or whether we intend to come away. I want to say at the outset that we are not coming away, as Senators have suggested and have demanded in the speeches which they have made here. We are not coming away, Mr. President, certainly under this Administration, and we will not so come away under the next Administration, no matter whether that be a Democratic or a Republican Administration. We will not come away, because we can not come away, as Senators have suggested and demanded, unless we write dishonor and poltroonery across the forehead of the American people; and no Administration will do that, or be allowed to do it by the American people.

When I make that remark I refer, Mr. President, to the obligations we are under to remain in the Philippines. Senators must not overlook the fact that we are under such obligations. In the first place, we are bound by the stipulations of our treaty of peace with Spain to remain in the islands asserting our governmental authority there, and our power there, for the protection of every Spanish subject there remaining in the enjoyment of his property rights. In the second place, we are so bound as to his personal or civil rights; and, in the third place, we are obligated by the stipulations of that treaty to protect all the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands in the enjoyment of their religious rights and privileges.

There is another specific obligation, and that is that the vessels and the merchandise of Spain shall have an open door with us in the Philippines for the stated period of ten years. We can not come away without providing for these obligations and their enforcement without committing an act of dishonor.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. By the mere act of taking title and taking possession and establishing jurisdiction and asserting authority and sovereignty we have bound ourselves to the subjects there residing of every other civilized power on the face of the earth by the mere operation of international law to protect them in their property and civil rights, and to stand between them and anarchy and chaos and disorder and blood and murder.

That is not all. We have a very sacred obligation in the Philippines which we must not overlook, if we conclude to abandon the Philippines, and that is our obligation to the friendly Filipinos. In the first order, I was about to say, perhaps it is a proclamation; at any rate, in the first official communication made by President McKinley after the negotiation of the treaty and before the treaty was ratified and promulgated to the Filipinos through our representatives in the Philippine Islands, dated, I believe, December 21, 1898, occurs the passage I shall read. After setting forth the negotiation of the treaty, and that in pursuance to that we would take possession of the islands in due time if the treaty should be ratified, the President said:

> All persons who either by active aid or by honest submission cooperate with the Government of the United States to give effect to these beneficent purposes will receive the reward of its support and protection.

There was a pledge given by the President of the United States, speaking for the people of the United States, to the friendly Filipinos who have stood by us and who have cooperated with us from the time we took possession down until this moment, assisting us to assert and uphold and maintain our authority there. We owe an obligation to them to protect them, as the President said they should be protected, by the strong arm of power of this great Government—protected in their property rights, protected in their individual and personal liberty and all their civil rights of life, and in every other respect, just as was contemplated.

But, Mr. President, that obligation would have arisen if there had been no such language as that employed by the President of the United States. Natural law would have created those rights. These people are not a few; they are many. They are not numbered by hundreds or by thousands or by tens of thousands, but by hundreds of thousands and possibly by millions. There are those who have asserted, and with good show of right so to assert, that a majority of the eight or ten millions of people inhabiting the Philippine Islands are in their hearts friendly to our cause and our flag and our people, welcoming us to their islands and assisting us to remain there.

But whatever the number may be, we know, Mr. President, that they are numerous. We know that they have given us active aid. We know that they have enlisted under our flag, that they have fought side by side with our own soldiers, and that many of them have given up their lives in behalf of our cause in the Philippines; and we know beyond that, as the official record has disclosed during the progress of this debate, that to the number of hundreds these friendly Filipinos, on account of their active aid and assistance to us, have been foully assassinated and murdered by the savage insurrectionists who have been opposing us.

Now, I say, in the first place, we can not come away because of our treaty obligations to Spain. We can not come away, in the second place, because of our international obligations to which I have referred. We can not come away, in the third place, because of our obligations to these friendly Filipinos, whom we have no right to desert, unless we propose, as I said in my opening remark, to act the poltroon.

There are other reasons which I might stop to enumerate why we can not come away, as has been suggested in these speeches, but I do not need to go beyond the point I have reached. I do not need to say more to that effect, because Senators who are in opposition have said all the rest, if any more need be said.

I have before me the amendment which is to be offered at the proper time by the Senator from Utah, and which is to be in the nature of a substitute for this bill. It has been an easy thing for Senators to stand up here in this Chamber and tell us about withdrawing from the Philippines; that we had acted unwisely and mistakenly in going to the Philippines; that it was our duty to get out as soon as possible, and that in that behalf we should make haste to relinquish authority and abandon all claim of sovereignty and the right to govern. It was easy for them to stand here and say that; but when Senators undertook to put on paper how we would do that they found the very difficulties in the way to which I have been referring. They got along very well with their first section. I want to call attention to this substitute carefully, for they show by this substitute, which I understand is to be offered on behalf of the minority members of the Philippine Committee, the utter impracticability, as it occurs to me, of their proposition, and the absolute necessity we are under, according to my view of it, for us to remain there so indefinitely that it is our duty to proceed forthwith with our legislation as proposed by the pending bill.

Section 1 reads as follows:

> SECTION 1. That, subject to the provisions hereinafter set forth, the United States of America hereby relinquish all claim of sovereignty over and title to the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands.

That reads off very beautifully. It was not much trouble to write that, and yet Senators will observe that even in writing that the minority found it necessary to put in a proviso, and that proviso is that we are to abandon, to relinquish, and come away, "subject to the provisions hereinafter set forth." There is to be some provision about it—some condition about it.

Now, let us see what the conditions are, and when you take the second section and read it you will find that instead of coming away they have concluded to stay. We have just abandoned—just relinquished—but at once we conclude to stay. To use the exact language of section 2—

> That the United States shall continue to occupy and govern said archipelago until the people thereof have established a government.

That is the first condition. There are a number of other conditions named, but before I call attention to them let me stop and dwell upon that one for a moment. We are going to "relinquish," and at the same time we are going to "continue" there in possession and in government until, not we establish a government, but "the people" of those islands establish a government.

Mr. President, the first remark I want to make is that that statement is misleading, at least it would be misleading to anyone who is a stranger to the conditions in the Philippines. The declaration is that until "the people" there shall establish a government. The Senator who drafted this substitute knew as well as anybody else that the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands are not "a people," but that they are many peoples and many tribes of many peoples. I find by reference to the report of the first Philippine Commission, of which Dr. Schurman was chairman, that they have three distinct races of people in the islands—the Negrito race, the Indonesian race, and the Malayan race. I find there are 21 tribes of Negritos, 16 tribes of Indonesians, and 47 tribes of Malays. There are no two tribes in the whole archipelago who speak the same language and have the same civilization, or have the same kind of domestic order or domestic institutions, or who have really any positive affiliation with each other except subject to some kind of material modifications.

The important tribes are the Visayans, numbering 2,601,600; the Tagalogs, numbering 1,663,900; the Bicols, numbering 518,100; the Ilocanos, numbering 441,700; the Pangasinans, numbering 363,500; the Pampangas, numbering 337,900; the Moros, numbering 268,000, and the Cagayans, numbering 166,300. This information is found on page 15 of the report of the Schurman Commission.

I need not read further to show that here we find before us officially a statement showing that there is no such thing as "a people" inhabiting the Philippine Islands in the sense in which that term is ordinarily employed, but that the inhabitants are peoples and many peoples of different races, with antagonistic interests, and anybody knows who stops to think of it, and contemplates what has been put before us in the progress of this debate, that if we are to continue in the Philippine Islands, and govern there until the Moros, the Tagalogs, and the Visayans all agree upon some Tagalog or Malay chief to be at the head of the government, which we will suppose they are able to agree upon, we will stay there a good deal longer than any of us will stay in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARMACK. I only want to ask the Senator from what report he was reading in regard to the number and character of the tribes?

Mr. FORAKER. I was reading from the official report of the Schurman Commission—the first Commission to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, that is not all. According to the substitute we are to stay there until these people, without any help from us—for we are not to establish this government—shall come together and shall agree upon a form of government, and shall frame and adopt a written constitution in which shall be defined the departments of government, the powers of these departments, and all the various officials—we are to stay there until all that is done. That means, as I say, longer, I think, than anybody here has been insisting that we should stay.

That is only my opinion. The Senator who framed this substitute, or the minority Senators who, as I understand, are to present it, may have a different opinion about that. They may think it is easy. It is because I do not think it is easy, and because I recognize, just as they recognize, that we can not come away until we substitute some government for our government, that I think we must stay there indefinitely and that it is our duty to provide for a civil government. But we are not to come away as soon as we get "a government," but are to continue there until they have established this government, and then we are to continue there, thereafter, until that government shall have given us "sufficient guaranty" "for the performance of our treaty obligations with Spain."

There, Mr. President, is a recognition in this substitute at the hands of the minority members of this committee, who are opposing the bill reported by the majority, that we have the treaty obligations to take care of that I referred to in my opening remarks. They recognize that we can not without dishonor pack our baggage, haul down our flag, call away our Army, and come home with it until we have made some provision for the faithful performance of the obligations we solemnly entered into with Spain when we signed with her that treaty of peace.

I need not stop to comment on what they are, for I have already, perhaps, sufficiently called attention to them to show the difficulty that will attend us in the discharge of those obligations or attend anybody else who may undertake to discharge them.

But now I want to call the attention of the Senate to this: We are the contracting party with Spain; these are our obligations; we have undertaken to protect the subjects of Spain in the Philippines. Would the Spanish Government be willing to let us step down and out, and substitute in our place a Filipino government not yet organized, and with respect to the character of which no man can foretell anything with certainty? Why, it is a preposterous idea. Is it for the United States and the Filipinos alone to agree as to what is to be done with respect to our obligations to Spain? Certainly not. Spain is the contracting party with us, and we must look to Spain as that contracting party, as well as to the beneficiary. I do not believe Spain would ever agree to that.

But let us look further. I said I need not comment further as to what our treaty obligations to Spain are, yet it comes into my mind that I ought to do so for the reason that one of these treaty obligations is that we will protect all persons—all inhabitants, individuals, corporations, and everybody else—residing in the Philippines at the time of this treaty, in the full enjoyment of their property rights and their civil and religious rights.

The great difficulty that Spain had in getting along with the Tagalos was on account of—I think it will be agreed here—the trouble over the friars and the friars' lands. The ecclesiastical corporations held a half million acres of land, I believe.

Mr. BACON. About 400,000 acres.

Mr. FORAKER. I have seen it stated as high as 500,000 acres, but say four or five hundred thousand acres. These ecclesiastical corporations held against the will of Aquinaldo—and all his followers agree with him—four or five hundred thousand acres of land; that is church property, as they claim. We entered into a compact with Spain, according to which we bound ourselves to protect property rights, and that meant to protect the friars, as well as anybody else, in the enjoyment of their property and their religious opinion and belief, and in the exercise of their religious privileges and rights.

Now, in this bill a provision is made to solve the difficulties we are having on account of these friar lands being tied up in this way, which provision has been criticised by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I have not had time to investigate it as thoroughly as I should like, but his criticism shows—whether it be well taken or not—what a difficult question it is that we have to deal with there. If it is to be dealt with, as we are proposing, by the selling of bonds for raising five or six million dollars, buying from the friars their lands, and paying for them with the proceeds of the bonds, and then turning around and recouping by selling the lands to the inhabitants of the islands, it involves a transaction of considerable importance, one behind which there must be somebody who is quite substantial.

I have said enough, Mr. President, to show how important is the provision of this substitute, that we are not to come away from there until we have sufficient guaranties from this government—to be established by these Filipinos—that they will discharge that obligation of the United States. Do you think that Spain would be willing—knowing how savagely hostile the Filipinos are to the friars and their property rights there—to substitute a Filipino government for the Government of the United States?

Everyone knows she would not; and we could not come away with our obligations cared for unless she would assent to it. But if she were to assent to it, then what would be the next consideration? We would then have to find that there was a government established, a government organized, and that this government, so established and so organized, was so successful and so stable and so resourceful from revenues or otherwise that her obligations to us to take care of that transaction, amounting to at least five or six millions of dollars, would be satisfactory and so just and so humane as to satisfy us that in dealing with her old-time enemies, the friars, they would, as we are bound to do, act with justice and equity toward all the people and all the interests concerned. That is a quite comprehensive proposition.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. We are, according to the substitute, to continue in the Philippines, holding title, holding possession, and governing the Philippines until they establish a government and until that government gives us a satisfactory guaranty that all our treaty obligations shall be taken care of. But we are to stay longer than that. We are to stay there and govern until that same government, having given all the guaranties and assurances that I have enumerated, goes further and gives us a guaranty also "for the safety of those inhabitants who have adhered to the United States."

I commented upon that a while ago, and I called attention to the fact that in the very first proclamation of President McKinley to the Filipinos—the proclamation of December 21, 1898—he declared that all the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands who should cooperate with us and give us their friendship, active or otherwise, should be protected in their persons and their property by the strong arm of the Government of the United States. If he had not said that we would have been so obligated; but having said it, our obligation is more explicit.

The Senator who drafted the substitute recognized that obligation; and, Mr. President, it is certainly the most sacred of all the obligations we have undertaken, and at the same time, as everyone knows, the most difficult of performance. Between these Filipino tribes and peoples, or, at least, between many of them, there is a natural enmity that has continued through generations. But between the Filipinos that have adhered to Aguinaldo and the Filipinos who have adhered to the United States, there is a savage enmity; and if we are to withdraw, it would be, as some one recently said in apt phrase, but to invite "a welter of blood."

To proceed, are we to accept the guaranty of a Filipino government to be established this year or next year or the next, that our obligations to Spain shall be discharged, that our international obligations shall be discharged, and that these, our most sacred obligations to the friendly Filipinos, shall be faithfully discharged?

Mr. President, I do not apprehend that it would be possible for the people of the United States or any Administration—this one, or the next one, or any one of the future—to be satisfied on that point; and for us to withdraw until all these matters are provided for is, as this substitute recognizes, for us to act with dishonor and to come away from duties that we have no right to evade or to disregard. That is not all.

The minority go on to provide that not only all that shall be done, but that, in addition, the Filipinos shall give us sufficient guaranty that all the rights which have been acquired by anybody in the Philippine Islands since our occupation of them shall be safeguarded and fully protected.

It was an able Senator who drew that substitute. He studied carefully this whole subject before he put his pen to paper. He wanted to draw a substitute that would recognize the conditions existing there, because he knew he would have to meet that proposition. He did not put anything in this substitute that he did not recognize he would be bound to put there before there could be any such legislation enacted. When he studied it, and when he so wrote, he was recognizing the actual situation with which we must deal, and, although he doubtless wrote it down in good faith, yet, to my mind and I think to the mind of pretty nearly everybody else who stops to look at it, he succeeded in making it clear that the proposition so glibly spoken here in debate, that we should come away immediately, this year, or next year, or in the near future, is an absolutely impracticable proposition which we might just as well discard.

But, Mr. President, there is something else in this substitute, which the drafter foresaw would be required. In section 4 it is provided that after they shall have adopted a constitution such as they are to be required to adopt they are, as in the case of the Platt amendment, to write into that constitution certain conditions:

Provided, That said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States:

First. That there shall belong to the United States and continue to be the property thereof such lands and waters as the President of the United States shall designate to the said convention for naval, military, and coaling stations and terminal facilities for submarine cables, the same to continue under the control and sovereignty of the United States.

Second. To carry into effect the treaty obligations of the United States with the Kingdom of Spain, and for the maintenance and protection of all rights and property acquired under the authority of the United States.

Third. That no inhabitant of said archipelago shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her adherence to the United States.

Stopping there for a moment, Mr. President, does anyone imagine that we would be able to select harbors, naval and coaling stations, and military stations in those islands to the satisfaction at the same time of this Filipino government and the people of the United States? Would they surrender to us, if the President of the United States should designate it, the harbor and bay of Manila? Would the people of the United States, if we are to remain at all in the Philippines, consent that their authority and jurisdiction should cease over that bay, to which is attached so much of glorious historic interest?

I comment on this and other necessary provisions—for they are all necessary—simply to show the futility of the proposition now made.

Mr. President, here is another. We are not done with these difficulties. The minority, in their substitute, recognize that it is not quite the thing for the United States, after these three or four years of occupation, to sail away from the Philippine Islands, leaving them to a Filipino government, the strength and power of which to defend itself no man can foresee, and therefore they provide so that we can not say—I mean the people who are in favor of this bill—if we come away other powers will swoop down upon the Philippine Islands and take possession of them, and instead of having the Filipinos next to us we shall have France, or England, or Germany, or some other great power adjoining us at our naval and coaling station, to be, we would hope, a friendly neighbor, but possibly an unfriendly and bad neighbor. So, therefore, to guard against that this additional condition is provided:

SEC. 6. That the President of the United States is hereby requested to negotiate an agreement between the United States, the said Philippine Archipelago, and Great Britain, Germany, France, and such other powers as he may deem best, providing for its perpetual neutrality and inviolability from all foreign interference, and also for equal opportunities of trade to foreign countries with said archipelago.

The President is requested to do this little, simple thing, just as though it were a little, simple thing—but an utter absurdity it seems to me, if I may use that term without intending to be disrespectful to those Senators who wrote it into this substitute—that the Philippine Archipelago, the United States, England, France, Germany, Russia, and all the other great powers are to join in a treaty making the Philippine Islands neutral territory and providing for an open door there for all the nations of the earth.

Only a short time ago we had under consideration in this Chamber the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in which there was a provision that, if England and the United States agreed, all the other powers should be invited to adhere to that agreement. We struck that provision out, and the Senators who have drafted this substitute were foremost in that debate and with their votes to strike it out, because they said, and rightly, such was the sentiment of this body and of the whole American people that we did not want any unnecessary entangling alliances with other countries. It was enough to have an agreement with England about the canal, and we did not want to invite anybody else in. You can make treaties easier than you can get rid of them.

Here we are now in what interest? In the interest of abandoning possession, the United States asking that all the great powers will join with us in an entangling agreement to the effect that that country, which we can not hold according to the theory of the advocates of this measure, shall remain neutral, and that they will not step in and take possession and govern, where, if we adopt this programme, we will have decided that we can not govern and with respect to which we shall have written ourselves down incapable. That is not all that is in this substitute, but that is enough.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Before the Senator leaves that point, will he allow me to suggest a further dilemma?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to suggest to the Senator a further dilemma that grows out of the substitute, which is brought out by the comment the Senator is just making. In the condition stated by him, suppose the negotiation of this treaty were made; and suppose that some of the British interests in the islands, which are large, should become endangered and should appeal to their Government for protection, and that Government, obeying its obligations to its citizens, were to attempt to protect them; would we not be compelled, under such an agreement, to go to war with Great Britain to compel its observance of that neutrality?

Mr. FORAKER. Undoubtedly, either that or else submit to having treaty obligations entered into so violated without our undertaking to call the violators to account.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Or, if British subjects should loan money to the Filipinos which they could not or would not pay?

Mr. FORAKER. There is just one more proposition in this substitute that I shall call attention to, though I have read enough to show that it is an utter impossibility, it seems to me, for us to enact such legislation and to leave there, having all these conditions complied with that are here proposed to be enacted.

Section 7 proposes—it may be the whole measure was intended to lead up to this one very significant provision—

SEC. 7. That immediately after the President shall have proclaimed that all armed resistance to the United States has ceased in said archipelago, he is requested to proclaim full amnesty to all the inhabitants thereof for or on account of political offenses and the bearing of arms against the United States, and all Filipinos or inhabitants of said archipelago who have been deported shall be returned to the place from whence they were so deported.

That, Mr. President, would cover the case of Aguinaldo, who has borne arms against the United States, but is now a prisoner in the Philippine Islands, and it would also cover the case of Mabini, who was his secretary of state, I believe, but who is now dwelling temporarily in the island of Guam.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And also Pilo del Pilar.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; and many others who would come within the same category.

I have said enough, for I do not want to unduly detain the Senate with comments upon that measure or comments of any kind. I have said enough, I think, to establish the proposition I started out with—that we can not come away immediately or in the near future from the Philippine Islands, because of obligations of this character, and it is an impossibility to provide for the discharge of these obligations in the way here provided, according to my judgment.

The result will be, Mr. President, if we can not come away with honor, we will not come away at all. The American people are not going to shirk any responsibility, much less will they undertake to shirk a responsibility if to do so they must do a dishonorable thing. They will keep their obligations. That means, Mr. President, in the language employed by the President only a few days ago, when he spoke in this city, that the "flag will stay put in the Philippine Islands." If we are to stay there, then we must govern.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator to say that we have certain duties to perform in the Philippine Islands; that we owe it to those people to see that civil government is established there; that we owe it to the Spanish subjects to see that their property rights are protected, and that we owe it to Spain to see that our treaty obligations are carried out. Do I understand the Senator to say, by his last remark, that after we have carried out all of these obligations he thinks the Government of the United States should still then continue in the Philippine Islands, provided the people of the Philippine Islands do not want us there? Does he say that we should continue to stay there permanently after we have carried out all the obligations we owe to those people?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the question asked by the Senator from Georgia is a very natural one, one pertinent to this debate, and one that I thoroughly appreciate; so much so that I have already answered it in the progress of the remarks I have made. I answered it, Mr. President, when I said that no matter what may ultimately be done, we are compelled, by the considerations I have enumerated, to so long remain in the Philippines that it is idle for us to talk about the time when we are going to come away or how we are going to come away.

I have always been of one mind in regard to this matter. I have always hoped that conditions might be such as to allow us to give those people the rights of local self-government, to give them their independence, if you please; but, Mr. President, what an idle thing it would be for this Congress to declare, as Senators have asked this Congress to do, that we propose next year to give them their independence, or ten years from now to give them their independence! Such promises could not bind anybody in the future. We are here to legislate for the present, looking at the condition as it exists now.

I say, Mr. President, that we are compelled to remain so indefinitely long in the Philippines that it is our duty to establish civil government there, and then, as we go along, in the years of the future, we shall be governed by what may be the results.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I will state my reason for asking it in one sentence—I will not interpose a speech or an argument, of course, in the Senator's very brilliant and interesting speech. The point which a great many people regard as important, and which, for one, I regard as absolutely essential, is whether the Senator and the people of the United States are willing to say that when all our treaty obligations have been fulfilled, and that people have established a government in freedom and in honor and are fit to maintain it and desire independence, we will then, without fixing any time, recognize their right to it, according to our old principles? I believe religiously that the affirmation of that duty, not fixing a time, would have prevented this war altogether and would at once end all resistance now.

I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio if he is ready, not to fix the time, not to abandon any obligation whatever, but to say that whenever the obligations are all fulfilled and the people desire an independence for themselves, which they are able to maintain, and have established or are ready to establish a government, we disclaim any right to hold them in subjugation for our benefit?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the question asked by the Senator is, I know, asked in all sincerity. I know how he feels upon this question, and I respect his feeling. At the same time, Mr. President, the question does not embarrass me in the least. This is not the first time that question has been asked in this Chamber or elsewhere. Repeatedly we have been so interrogated; and I answer now, as always heretofore, that, without regard to what may be any Senator's individual opinion, it is a most unwise and impolitic thing, in my judgment, for us to declare that at any time in the future, when we shall not be here to control the action of this Government, this Government will take action thus and so.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The point is—and I understand that is what we are fighting for—to affirm the right never to do it, and if we once say in any form of statement "we are not fighting for the right to hold you in subjection," the whole cloud disappears.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the Senator interrupted me with a second question before I had concluded what I wanted to say immediately in answer to his first question——

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FORAKER. There is another reason, Mr. President. Who knows exactly what the conditions are with sufficient familiarity to act even to-day? The Senator from Massachusetts thinks he does; and yet the Senator recognizes that all these obligations to which I have referred must be taken care of. The Senator recognizes that they will continue us there for a long time. Does it not occur to the Senator from Massachusetts, and to every other Senator who is disposed to ask such questions, that during the five years or the ten years or the twenty years that we must of necessity remain, there will be great changes in conditions, and that long before the expiration of that time the people of those islands may want us to stay, by an overwhelming majority? It is contended, as I said in the opening of my remarks, by well-informed people that a majority of them do now want us to remain. I have confidence in our institutions. I believe the Filipinos will like them better as they become better acquainted with them.

Mr. HOAR. If we are holding a man lawfully in prison as a punishment, or under a right of detention, and he is struggling to get out, and we can end the whole trouble by telling him that we are not holding him as a slave, that is what I think we should do.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, again the Senator interrupted me before I had concluded. I had a third answer to him which I will now make. He thinks that would settle the difficulty. His proposition is that we shall say, "In the indefinite future, whenever you have done thus and so, established a government, given satisfactory assurances that you will do all these things, then we will withdraw and allow you to be independent."

Does not the Senator recognize—it seems to me he must, as it is so plain to my mind—that that will be only an invitation to the Filipinos who are making contention against us to demand that they be allowed to proceed, and that they do this and that and the other, and insist that we are not keeping faith, or, although acting in good faith, that the guaranties they may have given are sufficient, when we think them insufficient.

It seems to me, Mr. President, we must look at the situation as it is. We have the Philippines. We have taken title. We have possession. We have established government. We are establishing law and order. They are ours—ours against all the world; and the thing for us to do is to set that house in order before we talk about making a disposition of it. We are doing our part, and, as I believe, doing it as well as we know how, laboring honestly and faithfully to accomplish just and proper results, and it will be for those who come after us in the Congress of the United States—for a great many will come after us before this question is acted upon—to determine what shall be done by the Government of the United States; and when they come to take action the conditions existing in the islands, the feeling of friendship or of hostility, whichever the case may be, of that people will undoubtedly have much to do in determining the Congress of the United States as to what action it shall take.

Now, Mr. President, passing that by, as I have said, we are to remain there. By that I do not mean forever. It may be we will remain forever, but while not necessarily forever, yet we are to remain there so indefinitely that there is no use to qualify the term. Therefore it is necessary for us to legislate, and therefore we come to consider a bill. In that connection arises the question, upon the speeches made in opposition to the measure by other Senators, what our policy is, what it has been, and what it is to be.

I do not want to go into this at great length; but the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], in a speech made here two or three days ago—last Thursday, I believe it was—after reciting the cruelties and the expenses and the other disadvantages to which we are subjected by remaining in the Philippines, said:

> No, Mr. President, the facts alleged by Senators when they tell of the terrible hatred, the terrible cruelty which the Filipinos have exercised, and the remorseless retaliations, as they choose to describe them, which have been perpetrated upon them, although we have slaughtered people and tortured people who have committed no wrong, show that we are entering upon a task that means a century, perhaps three centuries, of constant bloodshed, of war, and of insurrection, that means the shedding of God only knows how much American and Filipino blood and of how much treasure to be wrung from the American people, and all, as I have said before, for no other purpose except that a few carpetbag thieves may have unlimited license to plunder the people of the Philippine Islands. That is what we are asked to do. We are asked to assume all that burden, we are asked to foot the bill, we are asked to tolerate murder and massacre and torture for no other purpose except that a few carpetbaggers may have the opportunity to rob the people of the Philippines as they used to rob the people of the Southern States.
> That, sir, is the only question that is presented to the American people.

The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], in the course of his speech, made this statement:

> The game here—
> Referring to this bill—
> The game here is simply to open the islands to the exploitation of those who are on the ground floor and have already mapped out their mines or their forests or their other holdings, which they will speedily obtain through this instrumentality as soon as you shall have passed the bill.

I do not intend to stop, Mr. President, to comment on the character of that language. I know that neither Senator meant to have anybody understand that any member of this Senate is interested, financially or otherwise, in the development of the Philippine Islands, or that any Senator has any commercial interest there. We are all interested within the term "otherwise," because we are interested to have that possession of the United States made prosperous. Neither Senator intended, I know, to impute any improper motive to any Senator in voting for this bill, as some of us propose to do; and yet, having used that kind of extravagant language, it is necessary, or at least it makes it quite appropriate, that I should make some remarks upon the policy of this Government in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad the Senator understood me so perfectly. Some people do not, or pretend they do not, though I try to be very plain and frank. I have no idea that any man on this floor is engaged in any scheme of spoliation there, or that there is a solitary Senator who is interested in any such thing. It is my opinion only; I have no proof; I am only judging by the conditions; but my charge was that the policy of the Republican party in seizing those islands and conquering them was to provide a means for the investment of capital, for trusts, for the organization of combinations of wealth to go there and obtain possession of sugar plantations, and all of the elements of gain, and have the Army protect them in the use and the enjoyment and the getting of wealth, while the masses of the American people would pay the expenses, and a few capitalists would enjoy the emoluments or the benefits. That was my purpose. I believe it, so help me God.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further?

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I was about to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question, but I will not interrupt the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I yield if the Senator wants to ask a question.

Mr. President, I did understand the Senator from South Carolina. I have served in this body a good while with him. Everybody acknowledges his ability. Everybody acknowledges his frankness. Hardly anybody approves his discretion. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. The people of South Carolina have seemed to approve it.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, I should not have made the remark; I withdraw it.

But, Mr. President, what these Senators intended to say was that our policy was one of greed and selfishness in acquiring the Philippines and in remaining in the Philippines; and I say that invites me to make some remarks on that point.

I want to say, Mr. President, that we not only went to the Philippines in the way we are all familiar with—for the purpose of striking a blow at the enemy with whom we were at war—but we went to the Philippines as a matter of absolute necessity as well. It was a matter of necessity as well as opportunity and duty to go to the Philippines as we did. What I mean by that is this—something that most people seem to lose sight of in discussing this Philippine question. We did not start into the war with reference to the Philippine Islands. We wanted to liberate Cuba; but when we passed our resolutions of intervention, Spain answered with a declaration of war, and that let down the bars everywhere, and it produced unforeseen results everywhere by legal operation. I mean by the operation of international law.

A great deal has been said here in criticism of what Senators have been pleased to call the commercial side of this matter. Mr. President, the commercial side had a great deal to do with our acquisition of the Philippines. It had a great deal to do with our retention of the Philippines, and it has a great deal to do with our continued retention of the Philippines. But how? In this way. For many years we have been building up a trade with the Far East, with Japan and China and Korea, the Straits Settlements and Oceania.

Our commercial interests in the Far East long ago became so important that this Government adopted, as a settled policy, the retention of a squadron of our Navy, called the Asiatic Squadron, in those Asiatic waters. The Asiatic Squadron was not there to make war upon anybody. It was there to protect American interests, whether on the sea or on the land. Americans have been investing their capital in business enterprises in Japan and in all these countries. We have millions invested there. We were keeping our Asiatic Squadron there and have been for years, in time of peace, only that it might be there if it should be needed to protect the interests it was designed to protect. When this war broke out Commodore Dewey, in command of the Asiatic Squadron, was in the harbor of Hongkong. Now, what happened?

The declaration of war set certain international laws into operation. According to international law, the war ships of a belligerent nation can not remain in a neutral port longer than twenty-four hours. It is an act of hostility against the other belligerent for any neutral to allow the war ships of a belligerent to remain in her ports. Therefore it was that when the United States and Spain declared war against each other international law required of Admiral Dewey that he should immediately get out of that harbor of Hongkong. Where was he to go? We had no harbor in all that part of the world, no port in which he could stay over night. He had to sail out on to the sea, and he could not enter any other port except only for the purpose of getting necessary food, supplies, and coal—supplies to enable him to reach our nearest home port. He happened to be pretty well supplied just at that time, so he did not have to think about getting into any neutral port.

But, Mr. President, there was no American port where he could go. Every neutral port was closed against him, and he had either to sail out, as best he could and as long as he could, on the bosom of the sea, or he must sail to San Francisco, our nearest home port, some six or seven or eight thousand miles away. If he went to San Francisco he could not protect the interests he had been sent into the Orient to protect. We had thought it necessary to have him there in time of peace. Much more necessary was it to have him there in time of war, and particularly when we were at war with a power that had an armed navy at hand and had large territorial possessions near at hand.

That was the situation in which we were. Dewey was there. We wanted to utilize him in that war. If he had come to San Francisco he not only would have abandoned the interests he was sent there to protect, but he also would have come to a port where it would be an utter impossibility for him to be utilized in connection with the prosecution of the war against Spain. What was he to do? There was an opportunity and there was a necessity. The opportunity was at Manila and the necessity was also to go there. He could not go to another neutral port. He had to go to some port of our own or to some port of the enemy. The port of Manila was just where it would seem it ought to be under all the circumstances, having reference to the interests the Asiatic Squadron was in the East to protect, and having reference to the future development of our commercial and other interests in the Far East.

And so the President ordered Commodore Dewey to sail at once from Hongkong, within the twenty-four hours that international law allowed him, and go to Manila and search for and find the Spanish fleet, and either capture or destroy it. The President was a kind-hearted sort of man, and he gave the Commodore an option about it. [Laughter.] He found it, and he destroyed it. Then what happened? Why, Senators have insisted in this debate that he ought to have at once ordered "up anchor" and away; that he ought to have sailed out of Manila as soon as his work there was done.

Mr. President, where would he have sailed to? Nobody has stopped to tell us. He could not have sailed out of Manila, after the Spanish fleet was destroyed, and gone back to Hongkong, where he sailed from when he started for Manila. Neither could he have sailed into and rested in any other neutral port of the world. All he could do legitimately was to stay in Manila, or, if he abandoned that, and abandoned at the same time the interests which he had been sent there to protect, he might have sailed all the way back to San Francisco, where he could not be of any help in the further prosecution of the war. That would have been the supremest folly.

Mr. President, it was a necessity, as well as an opportunity, that took us there, and it was necessity that kept us there. Why should we not stay there? We had been all the years of our governmental life without any port in the Orient, and here the fortunes of war, at the very opening act of it, had given us a port, and one of the best in all that far Eastern country—a port that was at the very threshold of China, Japan, and all the many, many millions of people with whom in the future we are to carry on commercial business. Why should we not keep it?

But there was another reason why Dewey stayed at Manila. The destruction of the Spanish fleet was not the end of Spanish sovereignty there. If Dewey had come away there was no reason why the Spaniards should not have sent other ships there to cooperate with their army to retain their possessions and to harass and annoy and destroy our commerce in the Far East. And so it was; Mr. President, that it was a wise thing for Dewey to go to Manila and a wise thing for Dewey after he had taken Manila and destroyed that fleet to stay there until the end of the war. That did not take long. It came almost before we knew it; almost before we were looking for it.

I mention that particularly now because it comes to my mind that a few days ago we had a colloquy in this Chamber when the question of commercialism came up, in the course of which some Senator called attention to the fact, as though it were the discovery of a great crime, that on the 13th day of August, 1898, the President of the United States, through the Secretary of the Navy, had sent a cablegram to Admiral Dewey calling upon him to furnish information about the Philippine Islands and the Philippine people. I have the telegram here. I sent and got it in order that I might put it in this RECORD if I should happen to think of it, as I have thought of it.

Here is the telegram he sent him:

Dewey, care American consul, Hongkong.

This is dated August 13, as I understand it. I have not the date here. It was given as the 13th in the colloquy we had a few days ago about it. I will have it looked up and if that is not the correct date I will insert the correct date, but I gave directions for the cablegram of the 13th to be brought me, and this was brought me. Here it is:

AUGUST 13, 1898.

DEWEY (care American consul), Hongkong:

The President desires to receive from you any important information you may have of the Philippines, the desirability of the several islands, the character of their population, coal and other mineral deposits, their harbor and commercial advantages, and, in a naval and commercial sense, which would be the most advantageous. If you have other information which may be of value to the Government in their negotiations, the President may desire your presence here. If he should request you to come, take quickest route of travel.

ALLEN, Acting.

On the day before, Mr. President, the protocol had been entered into. I do not wish to read that in full, but I do want to publish it in full as a part of my remarks, and I ask leave of the Senate that I may do so.

Mr. President, in this protocol, entered into on the 12th day of August, 1898, it was provided as follows as to the Philippines. After providing that the Spanish should withdraw from Cuba and that Porto Rico should be ceded to us, Article III provided as follows:

The United States will occupy and hold the city, bay, and harbor of Manila, pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace which shall determine the control, disposition, and government of the Philippines.

I ask that the whole of the protocol, also the treaty of peace following, may be published in the RECORD. (See appendix.)

Now, why was it that there was this indefinite provision in the protocol? When you understand that you will understand why the President sent this cablegram that has been referred to. As I said a while ago, Dewey went quite unexpectedly to the Philippines. It was only a hundred days from the beginning until the end of the war. When the end came, he having remained there, it was necessary that we should deal with respect to the Philippines.

Every Senator will remember that the newspapers during that hundred days of the war's progress, in addition to registering the progress of our Army and Navy elsewhere, were busy discussing the Philippines, and there were all kinds of ideas with respect to the Philippines. Very few of us knew enough about the Philippines to know what we wanted to do with respect to the Philippines. Very few of us, to be frank about it, had ever heard of the Philippines, except casually, until that time, and during the progress of the war we had not had an opportunity to study them satisfactorily.

So when the war suddenly ended the President was confronted with the question, "What now shall be done? What shall be the terms of peace?" He had no difficulty in determining as to Cuba; he had no difficulty in determining as to Porto Rico; but the Philippines was a different proposition, and so having all kinds of advices, some telling him to keep the Philippines, some telling him to come away and abandon the Philippines, some telling him to keep only a naval station or a coaling station or a military reservation, and some telling him to keep a whole island, he concluded that by the terms of the protocol he would refer to our Commissioners the responsibility of determining what should be done with the Philippines, for the reason that they would have opportunity to acquire full information and act intelligently, something that it was impossible for him to do at the time.

Therefore he provided in this protocol what should be done as to everything else, but as to the Philippines he said the Commissioners, as by this protocol provided, shall determine, when they meet in Paris, what shall be done with the Philippines.

The President had a doubt about it. President McKinley was a careful, thoughtful, and conservative man. He did not want to commit himself to the acquisition of the islands until he knew what we were acquiring; whether it would be wise or not. It is no secret, but a truth known to everybody, that he came, conservatively and gradually and very reluctantly, I think I may say without overstating the case, to the conclusion that our interests required that we should take all the Philippines just as we did take them.

But the day after the protocol was signed—and this shows the industry of the man—he directed that information be immediately gathered as to the whole of the Philippines—information as to the harbors, information as to coaling stations, information as to the inhabitants, and information as to which of the islands would be preferable if we should conclude to prefer one and not take all of them—and he directed that in that connection reference should be had to the naval and commercial interests of the United States.

Was that unnatural? Was not that proper? Was there any evidence of selfish greed in that? Was there any evidence of a desire there to acquire a theater for exploitation, as has been said here?

Why, Mr. President, as I have been pointing out, nobody appreciated more keenly than President McKinley, who sent him to Manila, that Admiral Dewey was in the Orient to protect commercial interests, that he had been kept at Manila to protect commercial interests as the war progressed, and that it would be necessary for us through all the years to come during which we are to trade with the Orient to keep a squadron somewhere in the Orient. He remembered that we had found out how invaluable to us in time of war it was to have a port in which our squadron could stay.

The next time we have a war and have a squadron in the Orient, if we surrender now the Philippines and have no port there, our enemy may not have a port that we can capture, and then what will we do? We shall do just what Dewey would have been required to do if the Philippines had not been there. He would have come to the nearest home port and probably would have rendered no service whatever in the prosecution of the war. But, Mr. President, the result of these negotiations, that we are all familiar with, was that we concluded to keep the Philippines. I do not know all that operated upon the minds of the Commissioners, I do not know all that operated upon the minds of Senators, when they voted to ratify the work of our Commissioners; but I have always believed that in acquiring the Philippines by that treaty, that in ratifying that treaty, that in taking possession, that in continuing to occupy and hold and govern the Philippines, we have been acting not mistakenly or unwisely, but just the opposite.

Now, Mr. President, that is how we came to get the Philippines. Is there any excuse, in view of this record, for such statements as I have called attention to, that our policy in the Philippines is merely one of exploitation?

There is a record on this subject that, it seems to me, is sufficiently conclusive to answer that better than anybody else can answer it. On the 21st day of December, 1898, before the treaty was ratified, President McKinley issued a proclamation. I have already referred to it.

I here ask leave that it may be printed in full as an appendix to my remarks. (See appendix.)

I call attention to this for the reason, Mr. President, that on the 21st day of December, 1898, long before the clash came between our forces and the Filipinos and long before the treaty was ratified by the Senate, President McKinley clearly and unmistakably laid down the policy that he would pursue, and that policy was laid down by him in this document, was known to every Senator in this Chamber, and was known to every intelligent man throughout the length and breadth of this land.

In this document President McKinley, speaking with all kindness to the Filipinos as to what our disposition was with respect to them, nevertheless plainly stated that all who might offer resistance to the authority of the United States would be dealt with by the strong arm of power, and their subjection to our authority would be enforced, not by unnecessary use of force or unnecessary harshness, but by all necessary employment of force and power. His concluding sentence was:

In the fulfillment of this high mission, supporting the temperate administration of affairs for the greatest good of the governed, there must be sedulously maintained the strong arm of authority to repress disturbance and to overcome all obstacles to the bestowal of the blessings of good and stable government upon the people of the Philippine Islands under the free flag of the United States.

So I say, Mr. President, when subsequently, on the 6th day of February, in this Chamber, we voted by a two-thirds vote to ratify that treaty, every Senator here knew what the policy of the Administration of William McKinley was to be with respect to the Philippines and in the Philippines. He laid it down in that document. I have heard Senators in this Chamber criticise President McKinley for issuing that document at that time, saying that he was anticipating the ratification of the treaty, and that his declaration that our authority should be supreme in the Philippine Islands was premature, and that it had much to do with inciting the Filipinos to revolt.

I do not agree with that idea. I think it was a wise thing for him to do, and I think he did it hoping that he would obviate all difficulties that might otherwise arise. But however that may be as to the criticism that was made, the fact remains, and that is what I am showing, that every Senator here had that document before him when he ratified the treaty, and the newspapers throughout the country had the document before them.

Now, Mr. President, we had the war also before us. The newspapers of this country throw a very interesting light on the situation as it then existed. "Lest we forget," I want to call attention to some of the editorials of the leading Democratic newspapers of this country. At that time, Mr. President, the American people were unanimously patriots and not partisans. There was very little partisan expression in regard to this question. I want to show, in calling attention to these newspaper editorials, that President McKinley was not only acting patriotically and unselfishly, as his own official papers show that he was, but that he was acting in accordance with the most enlightened and most influential Democratic sentiment of this country as represented by the Democratic journals throughout the country.

On the 6th day of January, 1899, the New York Journal, which I put at the head because it has appeared to be the organ of the Democratic party for the last five or six years, said what I shall read in an editorial entitled "The President to the Filipinos." I quote this to show that this document which I have just put into the RECORD from President McKinley, dated December 21, 1898, was discussed throughout all the country. I have heard it said that nobody knew of it until after the treaty of peace was ratified.

THE PRESIDENT TO THE FILIPINOS.

President McKinley's proclamation to the people of the Philippines, through General Otis, ought to insure their hearty cooperation in our work of regeneration.

It is beyond reasonable doubt that the inviting prospect of peace, order, liberty, and prosperity under the American flag will be welcomed with joy by the masses of the Filipinos. It is to be hoped that it will be gracefully accepted by all. But if it should happen that an ambitious minority, intoxicated by the desire for power, should attempt to prevent that restoration of peace and order which is an essential preliminary to any practical training of the Filipinos in the art of self-government, it would become necessary to repress their pernicious activity with such firmness as the case might demand.

And if, in performing this work of civilization, American blood should be shed the position of our antiexpansionists would not be enviable. The first shot fired against the American flag would make domestic opposition to the measures of our Government overt treason. And those who practice treason find small indulgence in any country.

That is the way that Democratic organ was talking the 6th day of January, 1899, a month before the fighting broke out.

On the 11th day of January the Journal had this editorial:

[New York Journal, January 11, 1899.]

TRAITORS AT HOME.

For the unfortunate situation in which the country finds itself in the Philippines we have exclusively to thank the "small Americans" who at every step have treasonably obstructed the advance of the United States.

* * * * * * *

If bloodshed shall come of all this, and the rule of American civilization in the Philippines shall begin with a needless sacrifice of American and native lives, it will be these unpatriotic mischief-makers on whom the blame will rest. And if they continue their pernicious propaganda it will be something more than mere moral odium that they will bring upon themselves.

"Treason against the United States," says the Constitution, "shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

The small Americans have done their worst to turn Aguinaldo and his followers from friends of the United States into enemies. If, after accomplishing this devil's work, they "adhere" to their dupes, they will bring themselves within the strict constitutional definition of treason. If we are compelled to use stern measures with Aguinaldo, the place to begin will be at home.

On the 13th day of January the New York Journal published this as an editorial:

FRIENDLY ADVICE TO THE PRESIDENT.

From the remarks of some of your friends, Mr. McKinley, it might be imagined that you were preparing to "hedge" on your Philippine policy. If you have any such idea, let us give you a bit of friendly advice.

Don't be a coward.

It doesn't pay.

Recall a little recent history. You went into the Spanish war desperately against your will.

* * * * * * * *

It took you a long time, too, to make up your mind what to do with the Philippines. But at last, after months of hesitation, you took, or seemed to take, a firm stand on that question, and the elections showed the advantage of your position.

Don't be alarmed now by the outcries of a few moss-grown anti-expansionists. The noise that comes from that quarter is altogether disproportioned to the number of throats from which it proceeds. The mass of the American people is for expansion.

February 7, three days after the fighting had commenced and the day after the treaty of peace had been ratified, the Journal published this editorial:

[New York Journal, February 7, 1899.]

NO MORE NONSENSE IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Aguinaldo has relieved us of all embarrassment in the matter of our dealings with the Philippines. To the unprovoked attack upon our forces at Manila while we were exhausting every effort to reach an amicable adjustment with the Filipinos, and while our commission of inquiry was actually on the way, there can be but one answer.

Order must be restored in the Philippines. The men who have taken our forbearance for weakness must be taught their mistake. American authority must be established at once beyond challenge throughout the archipelago.

* * * * * * * *

Aguinaldo has put an end to American uncertainty. He has shown his unfitness to rule the Philippines. A leader that lacks the self-control to refrain from breaking the peace in the midst of negotiations is not the sort of statesman to establish a stable government. If we withdrew from the Philippines now the native leaders would be fighting among themselves within six months, and all the colonizing powers of Europe would be scrambling for the islands.

What a godsend it is that Dewey is at Manila.

"The native leaders would be fighting among themselves within six months," said the New York Journal on February 7, 1899, if we should withdraw from there. That was true then without a doubt. It is equally true now.

On the 24th day of February the New York Journal published the following:

"NO MORE ROSEWATER IN THE PHILIPPINES."

I will read this, Mr. President, to show that President McKinley, in concluding that we should acquire the Philippines, and our Commissioners in concluding that we should acquire the Philippines, and the Senate of the United States in concluding by ratification that we should acquire the Philippines, were all acting honestly, patriotically to carry out a great purpose of the American people, confined not to the Republicans, but shared in by Democrats as well. The leading organs of the Democratic party are the ones from which I shall read, and only those.

I also read it to show that at the time when it was written it was foreseen that there would be war of long duration, connected with which there would be brutalities and hardships no doubt, for the war had already begun and the character of it was developed and the character of the people whom we were fighting had been established.

NO MORE ROSEWATER IN THE PHILIPPINES.

It must be plain to the blindest that the time for a policy of conciliation in dealing with Aguinaldo's hordes of bandits is past. Men that deliberately plan massacre are unfit to govern themselves, much less others. And it must never be forgotten that it is not a question of self-government that forms the essence of the issue between Aguinaldo's crowd and the American authorities, but a question of dominion.

Please give good attention to this:

Aguinaldo and his followers are simply Indians and must be dealt with as we should deal with a tribe of renegade Apaches. We shall not follow the Spanish example of lining up the insurgent leaders on the luneta of Manila and shooting them in the back, but we must put them where they can do no more harm. The best place for Aguinaldo will be a cell in some secure American penitentiary.

What a place for a George Washington! [Laughter.]

Mr. President, all that from the New York Journal. I now call attention to the following editorial published at that time by the Cincinnati Enquirer:

[The Cincinnati Enquirer, editorial, July 25, 1898.]

Aguinaldo will have to behave himself. The country will take no backward step. The Spaniards have hinted that we are dealing with people that will have to be exterminated to keep them from making trouble. Well, we can not stop now, even at extermination.

General Smith, even if correctly reported, has not gone any further in the year 1902 than the Enquirer went in 1898.

Now, here is the Louisville Courier-Journal. I want to run rapidly through the country. On February 6, 1899, the Courier-Journal published this editorial:

[Louisville Courier-Journal, February 6, 1899.]

THE FIRST FRUITS.

Yesterday's reports of an attack by the Philippine insurgents upon the Americans at Manila have been confirmed. The fruits of the policy so sedulously cultivated at Washington by the opponents of the American treaty have ripened before they were expected to ripen by those who are responsible for them.

In order to beat the treaty negotiated between this country and Spain Aguinaldo has been encouraged in every way possible by a minority of the United States Senate.

The issue of force under such circumstances was hardly avoidable. There can be but one result, which will be the prompt and complete assertion of our authority over Aguinaldo and his Tagalos as it was asserted over the Spaniards. We know how to deal with the misguided and maliciously instigated insubordination of the Filipinos. We shall put them down at the muzzle of the guns behind which are Americans who have no constitutional pretext and instrument for turning upon their own country when American honor and interests are at stake. Would that we could deal as effectively within constitutional lines with those who are prostituting their constitutional privileges to endanger the welfare of their country and sacrifice the lives of their countrymen merely to play out their petty game of selfish and shallow politics.

That is pretty nearly as bad as anything the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] has said.

Now, on the 6th day of February, the day we ratified the treaty, two days after the fighting had commenced at Manila, the Atlanta Constitution published this editorial:

[Atlanta Constitution, February 6, 1899.]

VINDICATE AMERICAN STRENGTH.

In the light of the thrilling news from Manila, there now remains but one course for the American Government to pursue, and that is to conquer the forces of Aguinaldo.

Whatever doubt may have existed in regard to the ratification of the peace treaty between Spain and the United States must disappear before the treachery of the wiry Philippine insurgent, who has already proven himself to be as untrue to the Americans as to the Spaniards. As the successors to Spanish authority in the archipelago we can not afford to falter in the face of this challenge, thrown out to an army whose purpose was friendly, and to a Government which has never yet dealt unjustly with those who have had dealings with it. In our own way and in our own time we can deal with the question of local government in the Philippines, but as long as an armed foe stands in the way the only work ahead of us will be to vindicate the authority of the flag.

The American Government will always do its duty by peoples with whom it comes in contact. It is too great and too magnanimous to act in any other way; but it can never retreat in the face of such defiance as that which has shed American blood without cause in the recent assault of the insurgents.

The treaty must be ratified. The American flag must be upheld. After that we can take up the question of the self-government of the Filipinos.

Next I have an editorial here from the New Orleans Picayune of January 8, 1899. It had a long editorial on the President's instructions dated December 21, 1898, which I have already put into the RECORD. The paper, in discussing the situation in the Philippines, proceeds to say:

[New Orleans Picayune, January 8, 1899.]

SITUATION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

President McKinley's instructions to General Otis direct that officer to establish American rule throughout the islands, and for that purpose to take possession of all public property and public highways, respecting, of course, all private rights. When the American commander commences to carry out his instructions the insurgents will either have to submit and lay down their arms or they will have to resort to force. The question is, Are the Filipinos determined to maintain their independence at all costs or are they merely playing for the best possible terms?

Spain having ceded the Philippines to the United States, this country is n honor bound to take possession and govern the islands, or at least hold them until a stable government has been established. However disposed to treat the Filipinos leniently, the United States can not permit them to interfere with its plans or throw obstacles in the way of the speedy organization of a proper government in the islands.

Granting that we have made a mistake in absorbing the Philippines, the die has been cast, and we are now morally responsible for the maintenance of good order in the archipelago. It would be folly to recognize the insurgents, who are incapable of self-government, and it would be worse than weakness to temporize with them. A stable government must be inaugurated at once, and whatever resistance is encountered must be put down with a strong hand, no matter at what cost.

On February 6, after the fighting had commenced, the Picayune published the following:

[New Orleans Picayune, February 6, 1899.]

THE WAR IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The long-expected clash in the Philippines between the American troops and the native insurgents under Aguinaldo has occurred. The natives were the aggressors, and, as a matter of course, the American troops were victorious, driving the insurgents back and occupying their positions.

* * * * * * *

This action of the Filipinos should settle definitely the immediate policy of this country in the archipelago. It will now be necessary to crush the insurgents and firmly establish American control before the future form of government for the islands can be for a moment considered. All negotiation and temporizing would now be time wasted. The Filipinos themselves have shown that they were not willing to calmly discuss the situation, but preferred to take the chances of a resort to arms. This action precludes further negotiation until the insurgents have been thoroughly subdued and made to feel that further resistance to American control will be hopeless.

This outbreak by the islanders is the direct result of the noisy declamation in Congress demanding the immediate and unconditional declaration of the independence of those people and the abandonment of the country to their control. Those semisavages, hearing of the violent expressions in their behalf that were daily poured out in the United States Senate, and being assured that the treaty could not be ratified unless an express provision were made for their immediate liberty and independence, determined to supplement the services of their American allies by making a desperate attempt to drive out the western invaders.

This attempt was not successful, but it means that war is now a reality in a country where it was supposed that peace had been established.

That war will be no bagatelle. The savage audacity and desperate determination of the Filipinos to drive out the Americans are seen in their attack upon the forces at Manila, where the great body of our Army and Navy are posted. This act means that those people are going to omit no opportunity to inflict injury on the Americans, and the serious consequences that are to be expected from their desperate warfare must be directly chargeable to the active demonstrations made in their behalf in the Senate of the United States.

If this criminal paltering and temporizing with these Asiatic barbarians shall go on, there will be a repetition, only vastly more frightful and horrifying, of the conditions which resulted, some thirty-odd years ago, in the attempt by the Congress of the United States to set up 4,000,000 of negroes in these Southern States over the whites, who had been their former masters.

On the 25th day of February the Picayune published this:

[New Orleans Picayune, February 25, 1899.]

SITUATION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

The advices received from General Otis, commanding our troops at Manila, indicate that the situation in the Philippines has become very serious.

* * * * * * *

It must now be apparent to the most enthusiastic annexationist that this country has a serious campaign ahead of it in the Philippines. The entire archipelago will have to be subdued, and our generals can not expect to follow the usual methods of civilized warfare.

I cite this editorial because it seems to have some relevancy in a prophetic kind of way to that which has been so much commented on in the progress of this debate.

The Filipinos are Asiatics, and will naturally follow the oriental methods of deceit and treachery. No Filipinos can safely be considered noncombatants, but all must be regarded as hostile and treated accordingly.

We had read here the other day an order issued by General Bell, commanding the Third Brigade, I believe it was, in the Philippines. In the course of that he gave direction that all Filipinos should be regarded with distrust, should be treated as though they were enemies until they knew to the contrary, and for that he was most bitterly condemned in a speech that was made at the time when it was offered. But this newspaper man, the editor of the New Orleans Picayune, seems to have foreseen all this.

But all must be regarded—

as hostile and treated accordingly.

While it may be necessary to resort to some harsh measures in the Philippines, it is too late to turn back. No matter what the future of the islands may prove, this country must now subdue the people and establish for them a reasonable government. Negotiations will be of no practical value; hence a vigorous and active campaign will have to be waged.

Next, I have a quotation from the Nashville American. I call attention, in the first place, to one which appeared on the 2d day of January, in which was discussed in a very able and a very elaborate way the order, although the editor claimed that he had not yet seen it, which was issued by President McKinley to the Filipinos, to be promulgated on that island by General Otis.

GOVERNMENT FOR THE FILIPINOS.

President McKinley has cabled to General Otis a proclamation for promulgation in the Philippines, giving the conditions under which the United States Government takes control, and the intentions of the military occupation.

* * * * * * *

If disorders should arise, if factions cause fighting, if the Filipinos try to annihilate each other, or to make half a dozen antagonistic governments in as many islands, the proclamation warns them that radical measures will be resorted to by the United States to maintain law and order.

On January 31, 1899, the Nashville American said editorially, speaking of the condition in the Philippines:

We must make them know that our power is supreme, otherwise we can not give to them the blessings freedom and individual liberty have in store. The United States can not and will not yield to Aguinaldo. Aguinaldo must and will yield to the United States. The betterment of the condition of all the Filipinos depends upon acquiescence in the plans of the United States. The situation is forced upon us by the arbitrament of war. Filipinos must be made to recognize this fact. If peacefully, happier will be their lot; if force is required to establish this fact, the worse it will be for Aguinaldo and his misguided followers.

On February 6, 1899, the day we ratified the treaty, speaking of the fighting that had commenced on the 4th in the Philippines, the Nashville American said:

FIGHTING AT MANILA.

What has been expected, but hoped to be avoided, has occurred, and Manila has been the scene of a series of conflicts between the United States Army and Navy and the Filipinos. The Filipinos brought on the battle, forced the fighting, and were defeated, not, however, without inflicting a loss of perhaps 20 of our brave soldiers killed and 125 wounded.

* * * * * * *

We did not desire to fight the Filipinos; did not go to Manila to make war upon them, but to drive out the Spanish and bring about a condition of law, liberty, and order. Doubting our honesty of purpose, they attacked us. We fought and whipped them, and if they attack again the whipping will be severer.

Peace treaty or no peace treaty, the attack upon the American Army, if not already sufficiently avenged, will be further avenged unless Aguinaldo surrenders to keep from being smashed.

On the 11th of February, 1899, the same paper published the following editorial:

DEPOSE AGUINALDO.

Aguinaldo must accept the situation. If he will not retire peaceably, he must be deposed by force and exiled. We can not now pull out from the Philippines with honor if we desired to do so. And, being required by circumstances never dreamed of a year ago to occupy the Philippines, our occupation must be made dominant, and Aguinaldo must be made to submit.

From a so-called president he has now developed into a self-constituted dictator, issuing declarations of war, setting aside the constitution so recently promulgated, and ordering the congress to obey his mandates.

Such actions can not be tolerated and order peaceably maintained. One of our chief objects is the peaceable maintenance of order and the rule of law. If it requires troops more than General Otis has to bring this about, reenforcements should be sent him at once.

Mr. President, the policy thereby so clearly set forth is the policy which this Government has been ever since then pursuing, which it is to-day pursuing, and which it proposes to continue to pursue until Aguinaldo and every follower of his in the Philippines shall submit, and until law and order and government shall be established throughout every province and every division of the islands.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have just come into the Senate Chamber, and I want to ask the Senator from what he is reading?

Mr. FORAKER. I have been reading editorials from leading Democratic newspapers, published shortly before, at the time, and shortly subsequent to the ratification of the treaty with Spain, in which they upheld the policy that was pursued by President McKinley and the Senate in the acquisition of the Philippine Islands and in the efforts that we have been making to govern the Philippines, to suppress the insurrection, and establish law and order.

On the 6th of February, 1899, the Memphis Commercial-Appeal published this editorial:

WAR IN THE EAST.

Word comes from the Philippines that the insurgents have attacked the Americans, and, after a fierce battle, have been repulsed.

This assault was incited by those misrepresentatives in Congress who have been blatherskiting about tradition and viewing with alarm when the Army reorganization bill was up and when the treaty was being considered. The Senatorial junta has done all in its power to encourage the Filipinos and to bring an outbreak, and no doubt they are highly satisfied with the result of their work.

Twenty killed and six times twenty wounded on the American side ought to be a sufficiently sanguinary record.

Whatever may have been the views of these statesmen in the past, there can be no longer room for division. Ratification of the treaty is now an instant necessity. To oppose it further or in any way hamper the Administration at Washington were disloyalty to the flag.

The treaty should be ratified before the sun goes down to-day and Aguinaldo and his followers given to understand that they falsely represent American sentiment who talk of running away from responsibility in any part of the globe.

On the 7th of February, 1899, the Memphis Commercial-Appeal published the following editorial:

THE TREATY RATIFIED.

The American people drew a long sigh of relief yesterday when the announcement came that the Paris peace treaty had been adopted by a vote of 57 to 27 voting, or a vote of 61 to 29, including the absent and paired.

What of the future? The immediate future of the Philippines is not complex. Spain will be paid $20,000,000, and we will have done with her. Those who are warring against the country's flag in the archipelago must be seduced and reduced to submission. A stable government must be formed and law and order established. This may take time and trouble, but time and trouble must not be considered where duty is involved.

On the 8th of February, 1899, the Memphis Commercial-Appeal published the following editorial:

OUR FUTURE POLICY.

* * * Anti-treaty men on both sides of the House must not bother us just now with their clamor for a definition of the Administration's policy toward the Filipinos. No one can intelligently declare the Administration's policy, because it depends almost entirely on the natives themselves. As long as they fight American troops our policy will be to fight back and fight to conquer. Had these antis been a trifle more patriotic and given less encouragement to the insurgents there would have been no fighting, and now that the power of the antis for evil has been destroyed the fighting will soon come to an end. Uncle Sam is free to "take up the white man's burden," and he will not shirk the load. Those who hold up Aguinaldo as an oriental George Washington are wide of the mark.

Mr. President, I have quoted from the leading Democratic newspapers in New York, in Cincinnati, in Louisville, in New Orleans, in Nashville, in Atlanta, in Memphis, and now I come to Denver. I do not now see the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] in the Chamber, but I wish he might be here that he could hear, as I am sure he would with great pleasure, the exceedingly able editorials he published at that time. These do not read exactly as his speeches do now, but in the years to come those who are interested in the Senator from Colorado will, in my judgment, take a great deal more pride and pleasure in reading these editorials than in reading his present speeches.

He has a very ably conducted paper, and he is a very able writer, as might be imagined from what we have seen of him in this Chamber. He was first and foremost, Mr. President, in advocating the policy that William McKinley finally adopted with respect to the Philippines and what was finally put into effect when we in this Chamber ratified the treaty providing for the annexation of those islands. Not only, Mr. President, did the Senator from Colorado favor that policy on account of other interests, but also and explicitly on account of "commercial interests." I do not say that to his discredit. That is, on the contrary, to his high credit. Now, I want to read these editorials, noting with pleasure that the Senator has now come into the Chamber and is present.

THE NATIONAL POLICY.

Whatever may be the motives of the Republican leaders the policy which they enunciate is the correct policy for this country to pursue. The United States must take its place as a world power, confident of its ability to bear its share of whatever burdens may come upon it and to reap its share of the honors and profits.

"Profits."

Mr. SPOONER. What? "Profits!"

Mr. FORAKER. "Profits"—p-r-o-f-i-t-s. [Laughter.]

If the acquisition of the Philippines were a mere matter of taking possession of a group of distant islands, with 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 inhabitants, many of them little civilized, there would be reasonable ground to question its expediency.

But the question is far greater than that. Countries in Asia with a population between 400,000,000 and 500,000,000 are about to be broken up, dismembered, and perhaps divided between the European nations, which are hungry for their trade, and which are jostling one another in their hurry to seize upon choice territory. There will be the great commercial development of the future. Perhaps not twenty-five years will pass before China, as we know it, will have ceased to exist, and the aggressive powers of the Caucasian race will have parceled it out among themselves. The Philippines lie at the threshold of this imperial spoil.

Think of it!

Mr. SPOONER. Spoil?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, spoil. Imperial spoil.

The Philippines lie at the threshold of this imperial spoil. Any of the European powers would rejoice at the opportunity to secure possession of them, for they afford a vantage ground without a rival for trade operations with the Continent—

Now, I want Senators to get the benefit of that description of the Philippines; that the European powers would jump at the opportunity to get the Philippines. Why? Because the Philippines "afford a vantage ground without a rival for trade operations with the Continent."

While this editor was thinking so much about the commercial aspect of the Philippines, it certainly was permissible that the President, who stood charged with a great responsibility, should at least make inquiry of his representatives, who were over there, as to the commercial advantages of the place—without a rival for trade operations with the Continent and other islands of the far Pacific. If the United States were to fail to avail itself of the opportunity now presented to it we would feel profound national regret before the next quarter of a century had passed.

Holding possession of the Philippines, we shall be in a position to claim our portion of Asiatic trade, and if, to make the claim and to enforce it, we shall be compelled to participate in what some speak of fearfully and with bated breath as "foreign complications," nevertheless let the American nation go forward calmly and undisturbed to its destiny. This country is too great, too resourceful, and too strong to permit weaker nations—and by weaker nations we mean every other nation on earth—to secure undeserved advantages on the western shores of an ocean which washes our coasts for thousands of miles and is peculiarly the domain in which our energies and resources should find their outlet.

That is not all, Mr. President. If the United States had failed through the action of President McKinley to take advantage of that opportunity to acquire the Philippines, he would have been impeached before he would have gone out of office, in all probability. At least nothing would have prevented it except only a failure to get the requisite votes in the other House.

We would be shut out of participation in the commercial expansion of Asia, which will be the marvel of the world's progress in the twentieth century.

On Saturday, November 26, 1898, the Denver Daily News published the following editorial:

DEMOCRACY AND EXPANSION.

The Philippines will be ceded to the United States by the treaty of Paris, and, being ceded, no power on earth can prevent the ratification of the treaty. Some Republicans will oppose it, so will some Democrats, but the voice of the American people will drown down the piping tones of the Lilliputians that oppose their trifling opposition to manifest destiny.

The attempt of such men as BAILEY is to force upon the Democratic party championship of the policy of opposition to expansion. He would make the Democratic party a log with which to dam—with which to dam the overwhelming Niagara flood of American confidence and patriotism. He would withdraw the flag from Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, and abandon the latter to anarchy or to European nations as the spoils of intrigue and avarice. Such a stand means the overwhelming defeat of the Democratic party in 1900. If it is so unfortunate as to become Baileyized it might as well abandon its national convention in 1900 and enter upon a bushwhacking struggle for a few small offices and the support of a few small men.

He spelled it without a final "n"—

[Laughter.]

The Democratic party can not afford to reverse its lifetime policy and ignore its traditions upon the question of expansion.

There are small-minded and great-minded Americans to-day as well as in the past. There were Baileys in the Democratic party in Jefferson's and Monroe's time, as there are to-day. But then, as now, the progressive, large-minded stood by the policy that widened the country's boundaries and made possible its greatness. What other countries can do this can do better.

If Great Britain, with a population of 50,000,000, can govern and civilize 400,000,000 barbarous and semicivilized people while it strengthens and deepens the liberties of its own people at home, the United States can do the same thing better. We have unshaken confidence in the power and wisdom and greatness of the American people, and of their ability to happily and prosperously solve every problem of statecraft that may confront them while the vital principles that give safety and vigor to their own liberties will strike deeper root and afford enlarged safety and protection.

On the 29th of November, 1898, the same paper, the Denver Daily News, published the following editorial:

THE PHILIPPINES ARE OURS.

Now that Spain grants the whole of the Philippines to the United States, further opposition to expansion should cease.

* * * * * * *

The Philippines—

Now, I want this carefully noted—

The Philippines can be governed without impairing either the value or dignity of American labor. They can be made to yield ample revenues, even with the "open door," to pay for their acquisition and future defense. They will present a splendid field for genius and energy of the young of our present and future generations. They place the United States on the threshold of Asia and Africa—

He is going to take them both in—ready to gather our share of the future commerce of these barbarous and semicivilized countries. They will discipline American character and develop American self-reliance. They will be the funnel through which American genius and love of liberty will be carried to Eastern shores and from thence inland to the needy millions. All hail the Philippines!

[Laughter.]

What unspeakable joy there was in that editor's office at Denver that night. [Laughter.]

All hail the Philippines, the fruit of American valor and humanity; the nursery from which will go forth to other of the far Eastern countries liberty, equality, and fraternity.

Here is another editorial article, which appeared in the same paper, the Denver Daily News, of Wednesday, December 7, 1898. I am reading at great length from these editorials. I am doing that because I say with great pleasure they are the ablest editorials that I have found on this question in either any Democratic or any Republican paper. [Laughter.] I have not found any writer of that time who had so broad and clear a comprehension and conception of what we were doing as the man who wrote these editorials. They will reflect honor and credit upon the writer as long as they shall be known among men, and therefore I am trying to put them in the RECORD, where forever they may be read by the American people. [Laughter.]

The next article is headed "Hawaii and the Philippines." Not a phase of this troublesome question escaped this astute observer. Here he writes:

[Denver Daily News (editorial), Wednesday, December 7, 1898.]

HAWAII AND THE PHILIPPINES.

It is accepted that the cession of the Philippines to the United States comes handicapped with the "open door." Their annexation is impossible under any other condition. Great Britain's moral backing in our demands for the Philippines has been on condition that the "open door" is maintained. France and Germany have reluctantly submitted, but only because of Great Britain's attitude and the "open door." This "open door" means that our custom laws do not and can not apply to the Philippines.

I want every Senator here to get the benefit of that.

As to exportations from the United States to them, whether it is American grain or meat, or American manufactures or American anything else, they must enter the Philippines upon the same terms as like articles from foreign countries, and none other. If there is free trade between the United States and the Philippines, then all other countries must have free trade with them. If importations must pay custom duties, then those from the United States must pay them as well as those from other countries. This is the price paid for permission from England, Germany, and France to annex the islands. It is a dear price—a much higher price than the $20,000,000 paid in cash to Spain. It forbids making—

Now, note this:

It forbids making the Philippines an integral part of the United States of America. They can be held only as captive "foreign" territory. This contemptible fiction must remain a continuing element of the American system. The "open door" means that the Constitution of the United States has no place in shaping legislation for the islands. All laws for them must be extra-constitutional. They can not, as is proposed for Hawaii, become a Territory. They are and will remain spoils of war, held as "foreign" territory, and therefore subject to such exceptional and extraordinary methods of control as are permissible where martial law exists.

On the 6th day of February, 1899, after the fighting had commenced, we have this editorial in the Denver Daily News:

THE FIGHT AT MANILA.

No matter what individual Americans may think about the policy of expansion or the claims of the Filipinos to independence, the fight at Manila leaves us no other course than to inflict summary chastisement upon those who have been rash enough to invite armed conflict with the Army of the United States. If the Filipinos had been sensible enough to behave decently and to appeal to the priciples of liberty which are deeply implanted in the American heart, they would have created an increasing volume of sentiment in favor of granting them virtual, if not complete, independence at an early moment. As it is, their leaders have chosen to be truculent and defiant, and the encounter of Saturday evening was brought about by an attempt to ignore the American sentry lines.

Fate seems to have willed that we must undertake a big task in the Philippines whether we wish it or not. Had Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet in Mirs Bay or off the harbor of Hongkong we probably would not have troubled ourselves with the archipelago at all. Had the Filipinos taken the right course they probably would have little difficulty in building up a powerful feeling in their favor. But it was in the bay of Manila that Dewey found the enemy, and it was the choice of the Filipinos to threaten the violent expulsion of our forces from the islands.

Nations, after all, are actuated by pretty much the same motives as men. A big, powerful man might be persuaded to show clemency to a weaker foe, but he will scarcely consent to retire from the field when the little fellow throws bricks at him. And so Providence appears to have ordered it that we shall participate in the affairs in the Far East.

Tuesday, February 7, 1899—I am pretty near through these editorials, I am sorry to say; but here is another——

Mr. SPOONER. Was there not something about "Providence" in the last one the Senator read?

Mr. FORAKER. Oh, yes; Providence figures rather conspicuously here.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And "fate?"

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; "fate." "Providence," "fate," "destiny," and "commerce"—all the elements of national greatness.

I will now read the editorial from the Denver Daily News of Tuesday, February 7, 1899:

ONLY ONE DUTY.

There is now only one thing to do, and that is to knock peace into Aguinaldo and his followers—

That is what we have been doing—

no matter what we may do with the Philippine Islands afterwards. While the forces of the United States were holding Manila, which they had captured from the Spaniards, for centuries the oppressors of the Filipinos; while the Senate of the United States was debating a treaty which forever relieved the islands from Spanish rule; while a large and patriotic body of men was insisting on the withdrawal of the United States from the islands and the handing them over to Aguinaldo's government, if such it can be called, a treacherous attack was made on the American lines.

That act has made it impossible for the United States to leave those islands until it has administered proper chastisement to those responsible for the attack. While it may be determined not to hold these islands and may be disadvantageous to hold them, still our national dignity and honor will not permit our forces to be driven out.

All accounts of the recent battle agree that there was great slaughter among the Filipinos. They have discovered at the start that they have not Spaniards to fight. Perhaps they have been deceived by the kindness and consideration with which they have been treated by the American officers and troops. If so, they have been awakened to the real character of American soldiers, and this fact may have its influence on future operations in these islands. But now until Aguinaldo sues for peace there can be no let-up in the war in the Philippines.

Here is one more that I had almost overlooked. This is also from the same paper, the Denver Daily News, of February 17, 1899.

WHAT IT MEANS.

The ratification of the treaty with Spain and the passage of the McEnery resolution have not solved the Philippine question. That is more perplexing to-day than it was the day that Admiral Dewey sailed into Manila Bay. It has been complicated by the action of Aguinaldo and his army of insurgents. First, we broke the Spanish power in the islands; then we bought them; now we are fighting with the natives to hold them. We could not withdraw from them without disgrace, no matter how much we might desire to do so.

Mr. President, I have said enough, I trust, to show that the Administration of President McKinley not only acted without any improper motive in acquiring the Philippines, but that they were acting in accordance with the best sentiment of this country as expressed by the Democratic journals as well as by Republican newspapers from one end of the country to the other, and that therefore, so far as the acquisition of the islands is concerned, and so far as everything that was done with respect to them subsequent to the ratification of the treaty, and our entering into possession under that treaty, is concerned, there is nothing whatever, as the record conclusively shows, to justify such charges as those which have been made by the Senators from Tennessee and South Carolina, and other Senators.

I now call attention to the policy, as shown by the record, inaugurated by President McKinley and pursued by him as long as he lived, a period of more than two years. I want to do this as briefly as I may. Therefore, without stopping to read everything, I shall call attention in a descriptive way to what I want to use and shall put into the RECORD, unless there is objection. I refer to the various documents upon which I shall comment.

Senators will remember that before the treaty of peace was ratified, looking forward to such ratification and the responsible duty that would thereby devolve upon this Government with respect to the Philippine Islands, the President appointed what was known as the Schurman Commission, a commission composed of Dr. Schurman, president of Cornell University, Admiral Dewey, who was then still in Manila, Professor Worcester, Colonel Denby, and General Otis, five members. They were appointed a Commission in 1899, and were by the President, in a letter of general instructions, directed to meet in Manila at the earliest possible moment for the purpose of investigating the conditions as they might be found to exist, and for the purpose of making recommendations to the President as to what steps should be taken looking to the establishment at once of civil government throughout those islands.

The President sent this Commission to the Philippines before there was any conflict between our forces there and the Filipinos. He sent them before he supposed there would be any conflict. He gave them a letter of instructions, in which he directed that as soon as they arrived in the Philippine Islands they should make known their mission, and that they should advertise to the Filipinos, by proper proclamation, what the policy was to be upon which our Government would enter with respect to the Philippines, the treaty having been ratified and we having taken possession thereunder.

I will not stop to read that order of instructions, but will ask that it may be placed in the RECORD. It is found at page 185 of the report of that Commission. It is published there as Exhibit 2 of their report. All will learn who will take the trouble to read it that President McKinley exercised the utmost care, in enumerating their powers and instructing them how to proceed, to avoid giving to the Filipinos any offense whatever; but at the same time he unequivocally directed them to give the Filipinos to understand that we had assumed authority and all must obey and respect our authority.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask the date of that order?

Mr. FORAKER. The date is January 20, 1899.

Mr. MONEY. I asked because the Senator stated it was before any hostilities had begun. War had been waging nearly a year at the time that Commission was appointed.

Mr. FORAKER. Then this date is a misprint, because we all know that the Schurman Commission did go to the Philippines before the war commenced. Hostilities broke out while they were on the ocean, and the first they knew of hostilities was when they arrived there.

Mr. MONEY. I beg your pardon. If the Senator will permit me, the treaty was not ratified until after war had begun, according to his statement.

Mr. FORAKER. That is very true, but the Commission was appointed before the treaty was ratified.

Mr. MONEY. I think you are mistaken about that.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I am not mistaken. I will see now if I am, and if I am I shall only be too glad to correct it. I am certainly glad the Senator has called my attention to it. Let me read what the Commission say:

At the time of the Commission's appointment peace existed in the islands. On the arrival of the civilian members in Manila hostilities had been in progress for a month. The Commission was not appointed as a "peace commission," as it has been often called.

Mr. President, the document is rightly dated, January 20, 1899. It was February 4, 1899, when war commenced. The Schurman Commission was appointed, I know, before we had ratified the treaty, and before there had been any clash between the Filipinos and the United States troops; but I will read now, as I did not intend to, this order of the President, in order that we may make no mistake about it:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, January 20, 1899.

I think the Senator, upon reflection, will agree with me that the war commenced on the 4th of February, 1899, and this appointment was prior, as I stated a moment ago, to the breaking out of hostilities and prior to the ratification of the treaty of peace. It is addressed to the Secretary of State:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, January 20, 1899.

The SECRETARY OF STATE:

My communication to the Secretary of War, dated December 21, 1898, declares the necessity of extending the actual occupation and administration of the city, harbor, and bay of Manila to the whole of the territory which by the treaty of Paris, signed on December 10, 1898, passed from the sovereignty of Spain to the sovereignty of the United States, and the consequent establishment of military government throughout the entire group of the Philippine Islands. While the treaty has not yet been been ratified, it is believed that it will be by the time of the arrival at Manila of the commissioners named below.

Then it proceeds to name the commissioners and give them their instructions, which I do not, as I say, deem it necessary that I should stop and read, because it would take so much time. I only want to call attention to the fact that there was no mystery whatever about our policy with respect to the Philippines.

First, there was the acquisition under the treaty, with respect to which everybody was informed, as I have undertaken to show by quoting from newspapers from one end of the land to the other, as well as by quoting from official documents that speak conclusively on that subject; and now after the islands had been acquired, before the treaty was ratified, recognizing that as soon as ratification occurred the duty of government would devolve upon us, the President, being anxious to be ready for that great duty, appointed this very able Commission, a Commission that enjoyed the confidence and respect of the whole country, and sent them to the Philippines with explicit instructions, which instructions they were directed to publish broadcast in the archipelago, as they did, to the end that everybody might know what the policy was of this Government.

And what was that policy? The policy was one of extremest kindness and gentleness in every respect; a policy that looked to the immediate establishment of civil government wherever the conditions were such as to admit of civil government; a policy that looked to the displacement of military government as rapidly as was possible, and a policy that looked with jealous care to even the prejudices of the people in the Philippine Islands. In that connection let me read one paragraph:

The commissioners will endeavor, without interference with the military authorities of the United States now in control of the Philippines, to ascertain what amelioration in the condition of the inhabitants and what improvements in public order may be practicable, and for this purpose they will study attentively the existing social and political state of the various populations, particularly as regards the forms of local government, the administration of justice, the collection of customs and other taxes, the means of transportation, and the need of public improvements.

It is my desire that in all their relations with the inhabitants of the islands the commissioners exercise due respect for all the ideals, customs, and institutions of the tribes which compose the population, emphasizing upon all occasions the just and beneficent intentions of the Government of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, when that Commission arrived, in accordance with that general instruction and the authority conferred by that document, they issued a proclamation to the Filipinos, under date of Manila, April 4, 1899, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD. I stop to say only this, with respect to it, that it was in strictest accordance with the instructions which I have just read, as it might have been expected it would be, from the President to the Commission. (See appendix.)

They issued that proclamation, and then they set to work, and they were diligent. They were there almost a year. Their report of their work in the Philippines is dated January 31, 1900. After a careful and diligent investigation of conditions then existing they wrote a report in which they set forth who the inhabitants are, how many tribes there are, as I pointed out this morning, and what their relative degrees of civilization are; pointing out that while no tribe there is what we would call a highly civilized tribe, yet there are some tribes that have quite a degree of civilization, and that they range from that down to absolute barbarism and densest ignorance. There can be no question, Mr. President, but that this report in all these particulars is absolutely reliable.

But, Mr. President, among other things they spoke of our Army, and I want to call attention to that. In the progress of this debate we have not only had the policy of this Government assailed, but we have had also, as I understood it when Senators were making their speeches, the American Army assailed. When men stand here in their places in this Chamber and suggest that possibly this or that or the other brutality to which attention is called might be explained upon the theory that a man was responsible for it who had just graduated from a school of savagery in China and then mention General Chaffee's name in that connection, I understand that to be an assault upon the character, as a man and a soldier, of General Chaffee.

When men stand here and hold up the order of Gen. J. Franklin Bell and ask if anybody here will defend so infamous an order as that, I understand there is an assault being made upon Gen. J. Franklin Bell. When men stand here and in unmeasured language condemn Gen. Jacob H. Smith, I understand there is an assault being made upon him; and when men have stood here and have arrayed in the aggregate scores of brutalities and have charged them all to the army in the Philippines, I understand there is an assault being made upon the Army of the United States, and that it extends from the Commanding General at the head of the Army down to the humblest private soldier there. And, Mr. President, the country so understands it.

Mr. President, it will not avail Senators to say that in making these assaults they were not intending to assail the Army of the United States, but only undertaking to assail somebody here in the United States. Who is there here in the United States to be comprehended in this assault? I have pointed out most conclusively that under President McKinley, so far as he spoke, and he spoke for his Administration and spoke conclusively, there is no room to charge him or any representative of his Administration with any cruelty or with responsibility for any cruelty or any barbarity or any savagery, and the same is equally true of the Administration of President Roosevelt. And only this morning Senators disclaimed in this Chamber that they intend to include in their charges anybody in the Congress of the United States.

Well, if they do not intend to include anybody here, if they do not intend to include anybody at the White House, or in the War Department, or in the American Army in the Philippines, in God's name whom do they refer to? It will be in vain, Mr. President, that Senators will say "we did not mean thus and so." The American people understand the English language, and they do not need any interpreter, and they will not have any evasion in the interpretation of the language that has been employed. Now, Mr. President, as to what our Army was doing in the Philippines while the Schurman Commission was there, I read this extract from their report:

The Commission is not willing to close this statement without paying just tribute to our sailors and soldiers. The presence of Admiral Dewey as a member of this body makes it unfitting to dwell on his personal achievements, but he joins with us in eulogy of his comrades. We were fortunate in witnessing some of the many brave deeds of our soldiers. All that skill, courage, and patient endurance can do has been done in the Philippines. We are aware that there are those who have seen fit to accuse our troops of desecrating churches, murdering prisoners, and committing unmentionable crimes.

To those who derive satisfaction from seizing on isolated occurrences—regrettable, indeed, but incident to every war—and making them the basis of sweeping accusations, this Commission has nothing to say. Still less do we feel called upon to answer idle tales without foundation in fact. But for the satisfaction of those who have found it difficult to understand why the transporting of American citizens across the Pacific Ocean should change their nature, we are glad to express the belief that a war was never more humanely conducted. Insurgents wounded were repeatedly succored on the field by our men at the risk of their lives.

Those who had a chance for life were taken to Manila and tenderly cared for in our hospitals. If churches were occupied it was only as a military necessity, and frequently after their use as forts by the insurgents had made it necessary to train our artillery upon them. Prisoners were taken whenever opportunity offered, often only to be set at liberty after being disarmed and fed. Up to the time of our departure, although numerous spies had been captured, not a single Filipino had been executed. Such wrongs as were actually committed against the natives were likely to be brought to our attention, and in every case that we investigated we found a willingness on the part of those in authority to administer prompt justice.

During this time, however, Mr. President, the war for the suppression of the insurrection went on. It was successful in the great majority of the provinces, but there finally remained Batangas, Laguna, Leyte, and Samar, where still there was more or less of insurrection. As the war progressed there it became necessary to change its character, and that was done by General Bell. I speak of him instead of others because he has been so bitterly assailed in the progress of this debate.

I have his record here. I have taken the trouble to find out who he is, and I want to first put that in the RECORD. I find he was born in Kentucky, January 9, 1856; that he was sent as a cadet to the Military Academy at West Point upon the recommendation of the Hon. James B. Beck. From these two points we can judge something as to his political antecedents, if they are to be taken into consideration. But, Mr. President, I would not think of taking politics into consideration with an American soldier, and especially not in connection with the discharge of such a duty as that which Gen. J. Franklin Bell has so heroically, so gallantly, and in such a soldier-like way discharged in the Philippines.

Without stopping to read it, I will simply say, if it may be printed in the RECORD without objection, that Gen. J. Franklin Bell has a record of which any soldier might well be proud. Just such a record as might be expected would be made by the selection of such a sturdy character as Senator Beck. He was assigned because of his energy and his splendid capacity as a soldier, and because of the success with which he had met in other positions, to the command of what is known as the Third Brigade in the Philippines.

His record in full is as follows:

J. Franklin Bell, born in Kentucky January 9, 1856. Cadet at the U. S. Military Academy, 1 September, 1874, to 14 June, 1878, when he was graduated No. 38 in his class and appointed additional 2d lieut., 9th Cav., 14 June, 1878; 2d lieutenant, 28 June, 1878; transferred to 7th Cavalry, 9 Aug., 1878; 1st lieutenant, 29 Dec., 1890; regtl. adjt., 13 Sept., 1891, to 1 Dec., 1894; major, engineer of volunteers, 17 May, 1898, to 17 Apr., 1899; captain 7th Cavalry, 2 Mar., 1899; major, asst. adjt. genl., U. S. V., 17 Apr., 1899, to 12 July, 1899; colonel 36th U. S. Vol. Infy., 5 July, 1899; brigadier-general, U. S. Vols., 5 Dec., 1899; brigadier-general, U. S. A., 19 Feb., 1901.

SERVICE.

With regiment at Fort A. Lincoln, North Dakota, October, 1878, to June, 1882 (guarding construction of Northern Pacific Railroad May to October, 1882); at Fort Buford, Dakota, to May, 1886; professor military science and tactics at the Southern Illinois University July 1, 1886, to July 1, 1889; with regiment at Fort Riley, Kansas, to November 25, 1890; on leave to January 7, 1891, when learning that his regiment was in the field, he surrendered the remainder of his six months' leave, rejoined his regiment at Pine Ridge Agency, January 7, 1891, and served with it there to February, 1891; at Fort Riley, Kansas, being also secretary of the cavalry and light artillery school at that post to December 9, 1894; at San Francisco, California, as aid-de-camp to General Forsyth to May, 1897; on leave to July, 1897; with regiment at Fort Apache, Arizona (in the field suppressing Zuni Indian disturbances September 10 to October 11, 1897), to March 20, 1898; judge-advocate, Department of the Columbia, April 1 to May 26, 1898; en route to Manila, P. I., to July 16, 1898; chief of the military information division, Department of the Pacific, to April 17, 1899; acting judge-advocate and mustering officer, 2d division, 8th Corps, to June 8, 1899; organizing a volunteer regiment to August 17, 1899; commanding 36th U. S. Volunteer Infantry in the Philippines to December 24, 1899; commanding 4th brigade, 2d division, 8th Corps, to April 12, 1900; commanding 3d district, Department of Northern Luzon, to July 4, 1900; provost-marshal-general of Manila and suburbs to February 20, 1901; commanding 1st district, Department Northern Luzon, February 28 to November 30, 1901; commanding 3d Separate Brigade, Department North Philippines to date.

He was awarded a medal of honor for most distinguished gallantry in action, September 9, 1899, near Porac, Luzon, P. I., while in advance of his regiment, charging seven insurgents with his pistol and compelling the surrender of the captain and two privates under a close and hot fire from the remaining insurgents concealed in a bamboo thicket, while serving as colonel, 36th Infantry, U. S. Volunteers.

Apr. 7, '02, the President expressed his gratification and the gratification of the American people at the results of the campaign of General Bell and officers and men of his command in Batangas and Laguna provinces which culminated in the surrender of the insurgent forces under Malvar, and which will further extend the territory in which civil government is exercised.

Mr. FORAKER. When he assumed this command, Mr. President, it was after numberless acts of savagery had been committed by the insurgents. It was after our men had been bushwhacked, after they had been lured by treachery and deceit, and after they were, having been captured, put to death by all kinds of barbarity, their bodies disfigured in ways that are unmentionable, and it was also after, at Balangiga, Company C of the Ninth Regiment had been, by an act of treachery, put within the power of the natives and more than forty of them had been butchered in cold blood by a treacherous mob. It was after acts of this kind had been borne with for a long time that General Bell was sent to Batangas and there issued his somewhat famous order. I do not know of any better defense for that order than that which he makes in reciting the reason why he makes it. Let me read this order:

BATANGAS, P. I., December 13, 1901.

To all Station Commanders:

The United States Government, disregarding many provocations to do otherwise, has for three years exercised an extraordinary forbearance and patiently adhered to a magnanimous and benevolent policy toward the inhabitants of the territory garrisoned by this brigade. Notwithstanding this fact, opposition to the Government has been persistently continued throughout this entire period by a majority of its inhabitants. The enemy, long realizing their inability to maintain themselves without the unanimous cooperation and support of the entire population, have, in order to keep up their useless struggle, established a reign of terror by resorting to atrocities and expedients which violate the well-known laws and usages of war, as announced in General Orders, No. 100, Adjutant-General's Office, 1863, approved and published by order of President Lincoln, for the government of the armies of the United States in the field.

First. They have accepted local offices from the Government and taken the oath of allegiance solely for the purpose of improving their opportunities and facilities for deceiving American officials and treacherously aiding and assisting the cause of the insurrection, in violation of section 23.

Second. They have with bolos and other weapons killed helpless prisoners and soldiers lying on the ground, wholly disabled by wounds which prevented their defending themselves in any way, in violation of sections 49, 56, 61, and 71.

Third. In order to confuse their identity, and thereby be able the more safely to conduct their skulking operations, they have adopted the uniform of our Army and native troops without any plain, striking, and uniform mark of distinction of their own, in violation of section 63.

Fourth. They have improvised and secreted in the vicinity of roads and trails rudely constructed infernal machines propelling poisoned arrows or darts, in violation of section 70, thus placing themselves beyond the pale of the laws and usages of war.

Fifth. Men, and squads of men, without commission, without being part or portion of the regularly organized hostile army, without sharing continuously in the war, but with intermittent returns to their homes and avocations, and with frequent assumption of the semblance of peaceful pursuits, divesting themselves of the character and appearance of soldiers, have committed hostilities by fighting and making raids of various kinds, after which, concealing their arms, they have returned, posing as peaceful citizens, and secretly lived in the same towns with garrisons of our troops, in violation of section 82.

Sixth. Armed prowlers have stolen within the lines of our Army to cut telegraph wires and destroy bridges. Armed assassins, designated and controlled by the enemy, have come, disguised as peaceful citizens, into the very presence of our garrisons and have assassinated, in broad daylight in crowded market places, persons unlawfully condemned to death by the enemy for being friendly to or assisting the legitimately organized government—the fear, sympathy, or cooperation of the entire population effectually preventing our apprehension and punishment of the assassin. This in violation of section 84.

Seventh. The apparently pacific inhabitants of towns occupied by the American Army have treacherously risen in arms against it, in violation of section 85.

Eighth. A large percentage of the population, though owing allegiance to the American Government under the provisions of section 26, have acted as spies and war traitors, in violation of the provisions of sections 88, 90, and 92.

Ninth. A very great number of insurgent officials, soldiers, and other aiders and abettors of the insurrection, after voluntarily surrendering and after having been captured, have been pardoned and released from confinement upon taking the oath of allegiance or giving paroles, and have subsequently violated their oaths or paroles without scruple by again entering the service of the insurgent army, or aiding, or assisting the same, in violation of sections 26, 124, and 130.

Against but one of these flagrant violations of the laws of war, namely, murder, has the United States Government ever adjudged or executed the severe penalties authorized by the sections of the law above cited, in the vain hope that, by this exercise of forbearance and generosity, the people might be conciliated and become reconciled to and convinced of the benevolent purposes of the Government. Instead of having had the desired effect, however, this policy in the provinces of Batangas and Laguna has apparently failed to appeal to even the keenest and most appreciative intellects.

On the contrary, it has been interpreted by many as an evidence of weakness and fear, and, puffed up by a childish and ignorant conceit over what they are pleased to consider successful resistance of our power, the people have become so arrogant that they look down upon our Government and scorn its kindliest efforts at pacification. We consequently find ourselves operating in a thoroughly occupied terrane against the entire population, united in a hopeless struggle, using, conniving at, or tolerating barbarous methods which almost reach the limit in outraging the laws and usages of legitimate warfare.

The reckless expedients adopted by the enemy, especially the policy of intimidation and assassination, leaves, to the brigade commander no other means of protecting either the lives of his subordinates or those of peaceful or friendly citizens or the interests of his Government against the repetition of barbarous outrage, except the enforcement of the penalties authorized by the above-cited laws of war, and he has reluctantly concluded it to be absolutely necessary to avail himself of the right of retaliation under the provisions of sections 59 and 148, whenever the duly and carefully ascertained conditions and circumstances warrant the same under the restrictions prescribed in section 28.

The brigade commander therefore announces for the information of all concerned that wherever prisoners or unarmed or defenseless Americans or natives friendly to the United States Government are murdered or assassinated for political reasons, and this fact can be established, it is his purpose to execute a prisoner of war under the authority contained in sections 59 and 148. This prisoner of war will be selected by lot from among the officers or prominent citizens held as prisoners of war, and will be chosen when practicable from those who belong to the town where the murder or assassination occurred.

It is also his purpose to severely punish, in the same or a lesser degree, the commission of other acts denounced by the aforementioned articles. In this conection the attention of all American officers is invited to the last paragraph of section 29 and to the provisions of section 134. Commanding officers are authorized to enforce the provisions of this latter section whenever they may deem it just and practicable.

J. F. BELL,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

In other words, Mr. President, it is made clear by the order itself that General Bell issued that we had been for three long years forbearing and forbearing beyond what any other people have ever done in the face of such provocation as has been visited upon our soldiers and our officers there; that, finally, not because he wanted to be a savage and brutal ruler in that country, as charged, but because he found it to be absolutely necessary, as he states, he concluded to apply the law of retaliation, to the end that he might protect the lives of the soldiers under his command and that he might protect the lives of the citizens there who were friendly to the cause of the United States and that he might protect the interests of the Government of the United States.

True, then, he has resorted to the law of retaliation; but what is the law of retaliation? Why, Mr. President, it is talked about here as though it were an unheard-of thing in the history of wars. The law of retaliation, on the contrary, as General Bell points out, is provided for in the famous Order No. 100, issued by Abraham Lincoln in 1863. It is a law that ought never to be applied except only when there is extreme provocation for it; but if General Bell does not set forth extreme provocation in all these instances and in all the cases he recites, then I do not know what would constitute extreme provocation.

And what is the result? While Senators stand here criticising him and denouncing him as guilty of barbarity, he has suppressed absolutely in Batangas and Laguna and Samar the last vestige of that insurrection, and except only about 100 men in Leyte, as the official telegrams show, there is nobody left, even in the bushes, throughout all that territory to resist or challenge the authority of the United States.

Mr. President, this talk of barbarities by our Army is not new talk. I have taken pains to look at the record, not with a view of quoting it here, but simply with a view to familiarizing myself with it, and I find that our Army in the war of 1812 was bitterly criticised, as was the army of Great Britain, for the cruelties and barbarities practiced. And, Mr. President, there are hundreds of pages of the record devoted to the debates in Congress about the cruelties and barbarities practiced by Andrew Jackson when he was fighting the Seminoles and the exiles in Florida.

Mr. CARMACK. Does the Senator say our Army was accused of cruelty in the war of 1812?

Mr. FORAKER. It was, and also in the war with Mexico. You can go to the library and find book after book devoted to the exposition of cruelties and barbarities and outrages practiced and ordered to be practiced by General Scott and his subordinates in Mexico. If the Senator has been looking the matter up, he will remember all this. I would not have known it if I had not looked it up, and that is the reason why I make the remark in that way. The country was infested with guerrillas, rancheros, and they were ambushing and annoying our troops. Finally the General issued an order, and other officers did the same, that every such man under the law of retaliation should be given no quarter whatever, but should be put to death as the only way to break up such warfare.

During the civil war there were numerous complaints of brutality and cruelty of one kind and another. And now we come down to the Philippines, and we are told that there is more brutality here than has ever been heard of in all the history of the world. If the Senator from Tennessee had only gone back a little further in his Bible than the point at which he commenced to quote and had looked at the campaigns of Joshua, he would have found more cruelties and barbarities and wholesale slaughter than anything he has discovered in the Philippines. You will remember when the walls of Jericho fell Joshua was ordered to enter and slay everybody, old and young, men, women, and children, and that it was usual in that day to put all to death until no one remained to breathe. Both sacred and profane history bear testimony to the truth of the statement over and over again here made that "war is cruelty, and you can not refine it."

When men marching through the Philippines are fired upon from ambush and shot down, much more when they are captured and as prisoners are put to death without mercy, their heads cut off and stuck on the top of poles, their arms cut off, and legs cut off, and their eyes gouged out, and their bodies disfigured in every possible manner, the result is that the surviving comrades of such unfortunate victims will at the first opportunity avenge such savagery and such insult and such wrong.

Mr. President, I do not intend to talk about the order of General Smith; first, because I do not know whether he made any such order as the papers have reported. If he did, I will await all the facts before I judge him. I do not believe he made any such order as has been reported to us, or if he did I think we shall find, when we learn the whole truth, that there is a light to be cast upon it with which we are not now familiar. I judge that from the record General Smith has made. I also send that to the Reporter and ask that it may be inserted in my remarks.

I find that he, too, like General Bell, started on his military service in the State of Kentucky, although he was later appointed and charged to the State of Ohio. I do not have the pleasure of knowing him personally, but I have found that his military service commenced at the beginning of the civil war, on the 4th day of June, 1861. I find that he was wounded at Barboursville July 13, 1861, and that he was most severely wounded at the battle of Shiloh, Tenn., April 7, 1862. I find that he was also wounded in action at San Juan, and I further find that he has been continuously in the service of his country as a soldier more than forty years, and that his record is one as a soldier of which any American might well be proud.

It is as follows:

Jacob H. Smith. Born in Ohio and appointed from Illinois. Retires January 29, 1904.

Volunteer record.—1st lieutenant, 2d Kentucky Infantry, 4 June, 1861; captain, 28 Jan., 1862; captain, V. R. C., 25 June, 1863; honorably mustered out, 21 Oct., 1865.

He was wounded during the war in the action at Barboursville, Virginia, July 13, 1861, and severely wounded at the battle of Shiloh, Tennessee, April 7, 1862.

Regular Army record.—Captain, 13th Infantry, 7 Mar., 1867; major, judge-advocate, 25 May, 1869; revoked, 10 Dec., 1869; unassigned, 25 May, 1869; assigned to 19th Infantry, 15 Dec., 1870; major, 2d Infantry, 26 Nov., 1894; lieutenant-colonel, 12th Infantry, 30 June, 1896; colonel, 17th Infantry, 20 Oct., 1899; brigadier-general volunteers, 1 June, 1900; brigadier-general, U. S. A., 30 Mar., 1901.

Brevetted major 7th March, 1867, "for gallant conduct in the battle of Shiloh, Tennessee, April 6, 1862."

Mr. FORAKER. I can not believe, Mr. President, to employ the language of Dr. Schurman in his report as I read it a while ago, that transporting an American citizen across the Pacific would turn him from what he is here into a brute and a savage there, and therefore I shall withhold judgment as to General Smith until we know what the facts are. I do not believe a man who is capable of such heroism, such gallantry, such valuable service to his country would be capable of doing that for which we would all condemn him without qualification. It is not much for us to wait before we pass judgment. It is not much when the man who asks it is a soldier who has more than forty years of gallant service to his credit.

But recurring to what I was saying, all orders emanating from Washington have been of the character mentioned, and therefore it is, Mr. President, that in the Philippines the policy ordered from here and the policy of our Army have been in accord, and the sole aim of that policy, as enunciated here and as practiced there, has been to restore law and order by suppressing the insurrection and all armed resistance, and doing that with as little harshness and with as little loss of life as it is possible to inflict, to the end that civil government may be established.

Our Army has shown in this work a surprising humanity. It is a notorious fact that for more than two years after our operations commenced we scarcely ever kept prisoners, but almost invariably gave them a good meal and a good lecture and then turned them loose and let them go back, thinking and hoping that they would carry messages of our kind disposition that would result in good fruits to our cause. That policy worked well throughout Luzon and through all the provinces except only the four I have mentioned.

The insurrection there continuing and the inhabitants being of a different type of Malays from those we had been contending against elsewhere, being more difficult to deal with, being more hostile, being more treacherous, being more savage, it finally became necessary as an act of protection to our own men and our own interests to resort to the law of retaliation, and under such provocation our Army did resort to it. The action of General Bell in this respect was not unwarranted. On the contrary, he was but doing what is common in all such cases, and something as to the propriety of which he was the sole judge.

The result has justified what he did, for as a result of it there is peace to-day in Samar, there is peace to-day in Batangas, there is peace to-day in Laguna. There is peace everywhere except only in Leyte, where there are a few bolomen still in the woods, and in Mindanao, where the Moros recently got into a state of eruption.

A few days ago, when it was announced that there was trouble with the Moros and that General Chaffee had sent our troops there, the President cabled him to halt until the matter could be investigated, but General Chaffee wired back in such a way that he got orders at once to use his own judgment, and they went ahead. I felt sorry for the opponents of this measure when, a few days later, I read in the papers what ought to have thrilled every American, how General Davis, with the gallant Twenty-seventh under Colonel Baldwin, had stormed the fort of Banyan and had captured the garrison and planted our flag in victory on its walls. Every American should feel thrilled by that account because of the heroism and the gallantry displayed.

We should talk about that feat of arms to the people, but that is one transaction in the Philippines, Mr. President, of which you will not hear anything during the approaching campaign from the orators who have spoken in opposition to this measure. They, instead of telling the people, or telling the Senate, of the splendid progress we have made, of our brilliant achievements, of the gallantry of our Army, are hunting as with a fine-toothed comb for something they can criticise—for some case of water cure; for some case where some incensed soldier boy, trying to avenge the murder of his comrade, has committed some outrage that he ought not to have committed. That is paraded, and upon the strength of a compilation of such incidents we are told that our policy in the Philippines is a wicked and mistaken policy; that our Army has practiced brutality and savagery there.

Mr. President, so far we have made no mistake about the Philippines; our policy there has been a wise and patriotic policy; a wise and patriotic policy that was well considered before we entered upon it, and a policy that has been faithfully and consistently pursued from that day until this; a policy that has not been kept in the dark, but a policy that has been published to the world; a policy that has until now required the presence of the Army there, but the Army has done its work, and now the time has come for military rule to be replaced with a civil government.

I shall not enter upon any defense of the American Army. It does not need any. From the beginning of our Government down to this minute to belong to the American Army has been an American honor. Its officers have uniformly been brave, intelligent, and patriotic, and the men of the Army have been gallant and heroic soldiers, who have loved the flag and loved the country and laid down life itself unhesitatingly. What the American Army has accomplished in the Philippines is simply marvelous.

They have been under a tropical sun, in a climate to which they are unaccustomed, a climate that was thought to be dangerous, fighting an enemy who were skulking through jungles and swamps. They have pursued them everywhere, through the swamps, through the jungles, across the rivers, over the mountains, everywhere fighting them and everywhere destroying them as an organized force, in no instance halting, hesitating, or failing to win victory for our cause.

In due time that Army will come home, but, Mr. President, it will not come home bespattered with mud. It will come home in triumph to receive the glad welcome and the proud plaudits of the American people. Our people have always stood by their Army, and they always will stand by their Army so long as it is made of such splendid men, such gallant officers, such heroes, one and all, as represent us in the Philippines.

But the fact that the work of the Army is practically done only emphasizes the necessity for the legislation now proposed. It is our immediate duty to supplement the work of the military with the civil government this bill authorizes.

ARTICLE I.

And as the island is, upon its evacuation by Spain, to be occupied by the United States, the United States will, so long as such occupation shall last, assume and discharge the obligations that may under international law result from the fact of its occupation, for the protection of life and property.

ARTICLE II.

ARTICLE III.

The United States will pay to Spain the sum of twenty million dollars ($20,000,000) within three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty.

ARTICLE IV.

The United States will, for the term of ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States.

ARTICLE V.

The United States will, upon the signature of the present treaty, send back to Spain, at its own cost, the Spanish soldiers taken as prisoners of war on the capture of Manila by the American forces. The arms of the soldiers in question shall be restored to them.

Spain will, upon the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, proceed to evacuate the Philippines, as well as the island of Guam, on terms similar to those agreed upon by the Commissioners appointed to arrange for the evacuation of Porto Rico and other islands in the West Indies, under the protocol of August 12, 1898, which is to continue in force till its provisions are completely executed.

The time within which the evacuation of the Philippine Islands and Guam shall be completed shall be fixed by the two Governments. Stands of colors, uncaptured war vessels, small arms, guns of all calibers, with their carriages and accessories, powder, ammunition, live stock, and materials and supplies of all kinds, belonging to the land and naval forces of Spain in the Philippines and Guam, remain the property of Spain. Pieces of heavy ordnance, exclusive of field artillery, in the fortifications and coast defenses, shall remain in their emplacements for the term of six months, to be reckoned from the exchange of ratifications of the treaty; and the United States may, in the meantime, purchase such material from Spain, if a satisfactory agreement between the two Governments on the subject shall be reached.

ARTICLE VI.

Spain will, upon the signature of the present treaty, release all prisoners of war, and all persons detained or imprisoned for political offenses, in connection with the insurrections in Cuba and the Philippines and the war with the United States.

Reciprocally, the United States will release all persons made prisoners of war by the American forces, and will undertake to obtain the release of all Spanish prisoners in the hands of the insurgents in Cuba and the Philippines.

The Government of the United States will at its own cost return to Spain and the Government of Spain will at its own cost return to the United States, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, according to the situation of their respective homes, prisoners released or caused to be released by them, respectively, under this article.

ARTICLE VII.

The United States and Spain mutually relinquish all claims for indemnity, national and individual, of every kind, of either Government, or of its citizens or subjects, against the other Government, that may have arisen since the beginning of the late insurrection in Cuba and prior to the exchange of ratifications of the present treaty, including all claims for indemnity for the cost of the war.

The United States will adjudicate and settle the claims of its citizens against Spain relinquished in this article.

ARTICLE VIII.

In conformity with the provisions of Articles I, II, and III of this treaty, Spain relinquishes in Cuba, and cedes in Porto Rico and other islands in the West Indies, in the island of Guam, and in the Philippine Archipelago, all the buildings, wharves, barracks, forts, structures, public highways and other immovable property which, in conformity with law, belong to the public domain, and as such belong to the Crown of Spain.

And it is hereby declared that the relinquishment or cession, as the case may be, to which the preceding paragraph refers, can not in any respect impair the property or rights which by law belong to the peaceful possession of property of all kinds, of provinces, municipalities, public or private establishments, ecclesiastical or civic bodies, or any other associations having legal capacity to acquire and possess property in the aforesaid territories renounced or ceded, or of private individuals, of whatsoever nationality such individuals may be.

The aforesaid relinquishment or cession, as the case may be, includes all documents exclusively referring to the sovereignty relinquished or ceded that may exist in the archives of the peninsula. Where any document in such archives only in part relates to said sovereignty, a copy of such part will be furnished whenever it shall be requested. Like rules shall be reciprocally observed in favor of Spain in respect of documents in the archives of the islands above referred to.

In the aforesaid relinquishment or cession, as the case may be, are also included such rights as the Crown of Spain and its authorities possess in respect of the official archives and records, executive as well as judicial, in the islands above referred to which relate to said islands or the rights and property of their inhabitants. Such archives and records shall be carefully preserved, and private persons shall without distinction have the right to require, in accordance with law, authenticated copies of the contracts, wills, and other instruments forming part of notarial protocols or files, or which may be contained in the executive or judicial archives, be the latter in Spain or in the islands aforesaid.

ARTICLE IX.

Spanish subjects, natives of the peninsula, residing in the territory over which Spain by the present treaty relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty, may remain in such territory or may remove therefrom, retaining in either event all their rights of property, including the right to sell or dispose of such property or of its proceeds; and they shall also have the right to carry on their industry, commerce, and professions, being subject in respect thereof to such laws as are applicable to other foreigners. In case they remain in the territory they may preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain by making, before a court of record, within a year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, a declaration of their decisions to preserve such allegiance; in default of which declaration they shall be held to have renounced it and to have adopted the nationality of the territory in which they may reside.

The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

ARTICLE X.

The inhabitants of the territories over which Spain relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion.

ARTICLE XI.

The Spaniards residing in the territories over which Spain by this treaty cedes or relinquishes her sovereignty shall be subject in matters civil as well as criminal to the jurisdiction of the courts of the country wherein they reside, pursuant to the ordinary laws governing the same; and they shall have the right to appear before such courts and to pursue the same course as citizens of the country to which the courts belong.

ARTICLE XII.

Judicial proceedings pending at the time of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty in the territories over which Spain relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty shall be determined according to the following rules:

1. Judgments rendered either in civil suits between private individuals, or in criminal matters, before the date mentioned, and with respect to which there is no recourse or right of review under the Spanish law, shall be deemed to be final, and shall be executed in due form by competent authority in the territory within which such judgments should be carried out.

2. Civil suits between private individuals which may on the date mentioned be undetermined shall be prosecuted to judgment before the court in which they may then be pending or in the court that may be substituted therefor.

3. Criminal actions pending on the date mentioned before the supreme court of Spain against citizens of the territory which by this treaty ceases to be Spanish shall continue under its jurisdiction until final judgment; but, such judgment having been rendered, the execution thereof shall be committed to the competent authority of the place in which the case arose.

ARTICLE XIII.

The rights of property secured by copyrights and patents acquired by Spaniards in the island of Cuba and in Porto Rico, the Philippines, and other ceded territories, at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, shall continue to be respected. Spanish scientific, literary, and artistic works, not subversive of public order in the territories in question, shall continue to be admitted free of duty into such territories for the period of ten years, to be reckoned from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

ARTICLE XIV.

Spain will have the power to establish consular officers in the ports and places of the territories, the sovereignty over which has been either relinquished or ceded by the present treaty.

ARTICLE XV.

The Government of each country will, for the term of ten years, accord to the merchant vessels of the other country the same treatment in respect of all port charges, including entrance and clearance dues, light dues, and tonnage duties, as it accords to its own merchant vessels not engaged in the coastwise trade.

This article may at any time be terminated on a six months' notice, given by either Government to the other.

ARTICLE XVI.

It is understood that any obligations assumed in this treaty by the United States with respect to Cuba are limited to the time of its occupancy thereof; but it will, upon the termination of such occupancy, advise any government established in the island to assume the same obligations.

ARTICLE XVII.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from the date hereof, or earlier if possible.

In faith whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this treaty, and have hereunto affixed our seals.

APPENDIX III.

ORDER OF PRESIDENT M'KINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, December 21, 1898.

SIR: The destruction of the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila by the United States naval squadron commanded by Rear-Admiral Dewey, followed by the reduction of the city and the surrender of the Spanish forces, practically effected the conquest of the Philippine Islands and the suspension of Spanish sovereignty therein.

With the signature of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain by their respective plenipotentiaries at Paris, on the 10th instant, and as the result of the victories of American arms, the future control, disposition, and government of the Philippine Islands are ceded to the United States. In fulfillment of the rights of sovereignty thus acquired and the responsible obligations of government thus assumed, the actual occupation and administration of the entire group of the Philippine Islands become immediately necessary, and the military government heretofore maintained by the United States in the city, harbor, and bay of Manila is to be extended with all possible dispatch to the whole of the ceded territory.

In performing this duty, the military commander of the United States is enjoined to make known to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands that in succeeding to the sovereignty of Spain, in severing the former political relations of the inhabitants, and in establishing a new political power, the authority of the United States is to be exerted for the security of the persons and property of the people of the islands and for the confirmation of all their private rights and relations.

It will be the duty of the commander of the forces of occupation to announce and proclaim in the most public manner that we come, not as invaders or conquerors, but as friends, to protect the natives in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights. All persons who, either by active aid or by honest submission, cooperate with the Government of the United States to give effect to these beneficent purposes, will receive the reward of its support and protection. All others will be brought within the lawful rule we have assumed, with firmness, if need be, but without severity, so far as may be possible.

Within the absolute domain of military authority, which necessarily is and must remain supreme in the ceded territory until the legislation of the United States shall otherwise provide, the municipal laws of the territory in respect to private rights and property and the repression of crime are to be considered as continuing in force, and to be administered by the ordinary tribunals so far as practicable. The operations of civil and municipal government are to performed by such officers as may accept the supremacy of the United States by taking the oath of allegiance, or by officers chosen as far as may be practicable from the inhabitants of the islands.

While the control of all the public property and the revenues of the state passes with the cession, and while the use and management of all public means of transportation are necessarily reserved to the authority of the United States, private property, whether belonging to individuals or corporations, is to be respected, except for cause duly established. The taxes and duties heretofore payable by the inhabitants to the late Government become payable to the authorities of the United States, unless it be seen fit to substitute for them other reasonable rates or modes of contribution to the expenses of government, whether general or local. If private property be taken for military use it shall be paid for, when possible, in cash at a fair valuation, and when payment in cash is not practicable receipts are to be given.

All ports and places in the Philippine Islands in the actual possession of the land and naval forces of the United States will be opened to the commerce of all friendly nations. All goods and wares not prohibited for military reasons, by due announcement of the military authority, will be admitted upon payment of such duties and other charges as shall be in force at the time of their importation.

Finally, it should be the earnest and paramount aim of the military administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the Philippines by assuring to them in every possible way that full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the heritage of free peoples, and by proving to them that the mission of the United States is one of benevolent assimilation, substituting the mild sway of justice and right for arbitrary rule. In the fulfillment of this high mission, supporting the temperate administration of affairs for the greatest good of the governed, there must be sedulously maintained the strong arm of authority to repress disturbance and to overcome all obstacles to the bestowal of the blessings of good and stable government upon the people of the Philippine Islands under the free flag of the United States.

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

APPENDIX IV.

PROCLAMATION OF PHILIPPINE COMMISSION.

To the people of the Philippine Islands:

The treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, ratified several weeks ago by the former, having on March 20 been ratified by the latter, the cession to the United States, as stipulated by the treaty, of the sovereignty which Spain possessed and exercised over the Philippine Islands has now, in accordance with the laws of nations, received a complete and indefeasible consummation.

In order that the high responsibilities and obligations with which the United States has thus become definitively charged may be fulfilled in a way calculated to promote the best interests of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, His Excellency the President of the United States has appointed the undersigned a civil commission on Philippine affairs, clothing them with all the powers necessary for the exercise of that office.

The Commission desire to assure the people of the Philippine Islands of the cordial good will and fraternal feeling which is entertained for them by His Excellency the President of the United States and by the American people. The aim and object of the American Government, apart from the fulfillment of the solemn obligations it has assumed toward the family of nations by the acceptance of sovereignty over the Philippine Islands, is the well-being, the prosperity, and the happiness of the Philippine people and their elevation and advancement to a position among the most civilized people of the world.

His Excellency the President of the United States believes that this felicity and perfection of the Philippine people is to be brought about by the assurance of peace and order; by the guaranty of civil and religious liberty; by the establishment of justice; by the cultivation of letters, science, and the liberal and practical arts; by the enlargement of intercourse with foreign nations; by the expansion of industrial pursuits, trade, and commerce; by the multiplication and improvement of the means of internal communication; by the development, with the aid of modern mechanical inventions, of the great natural resources of the archipelago; and, in a word, by the uninterrupted devotion of the people to the pursuit of those useful objects and the realization of those noble ideals which constitute the higher civilization of mankind.

Unfortunately, the pure aims and purposes of the American Government and people have been misinterpreted to some of the inhabitants of certain of the islands. As a consequence, the friendly American forces have, without provocation or cause, been openly attacked.

And why these hostilities? What do the best Filipinos desire? Can it be more than the United States is ready to give? They are patriots and want liberty, it is said. The Commission emphatically assert that the United States is not only willing, but anxious, to establish in the Philippine Islands an enlightened system of government under which the Philippine people may enjoy the largest measure of home rule and the amplest liberty consonant with the supreme ends of government and compatible with those obligations which the United States has assumed toward the civilized nations of the world.

The United States striving earnestly for the welfare and advancement of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, there can be no real conflict between American sovereignty and the rights and liberties of the Philippine people, for, just as the United States stands ready to furnish armies, navies, and all the infinite resources of a great and powerful nation to maintain and support its rightful supremacy over the Philippine Islands, so it is even more solicitous to spread peace and happiness among the Philippine people; to guarantee them a rightful freedom; to protect them in their just privileges and immunities; to accustom them to free self-government in an ever-increasing measure, and to encourage them in those democratic aspirations, sentiments, and ideals which are the promise and potency of a fruitful national development.

It is the expectation of the Commission to visit the Philippine peoples in their respective provinces, both for the purpose of cultivating a more intimate mutual acquaintance, and also with a view to ascertaining from enlightened native opinion what form or forms of government seem best adapted to the Philippine peoples, most apt to conduce to their highest welfare, and most conformable to their customs, traditions, sentiments, and cherished ideals. Both in the establishment and maintenance of government in the Philippine Islands it will be the policy of the United States to consult the views and wishes, and to secure the advice, cooperation, and aid of the Philippine people themselves.

In the meantime the attention of the Philippine people is invited to certain regulative principles by which the United States will be guided in its relations with them. The following are deemed of cardinal importance:

"1. The supremacy of the United States must and will be enforced throughout every part of the archipelago, and those who resist it can accomplish no end other than their own ruin.

"2. The most ample liberty of self-government will be granted to the Philippine people which is reconcilable with the maintenance of a wise, just, stable, effective, and economical administration of public affairs, and compatible with the sovereign and international rights and obligations of the United States.

"3. The civil rights of the Philippine people will be guaranteed and protected to the fullest extent; religious freedom assured, and all persons shall have an equal standing before the law.

"4. Honor, justice, and friendship forbid the use of the Philippine people or islands as an object or means of exploitation. The purpose of the American Government is the welfare and advancement of the Philippine people.

"5. There shall be guaranteed to the Philippine people an honest and effective civil service, in which, to the fullest extent practicable, natives shall be employed.

"6. The collection and application of taxes and revenues will be put upon a sound, honest, and economical basis. Public funds, raised justly and collected honestly, will be applied only in defraying the regular and proper expenses incurred by and for the establishment and maintenance of the Philippine government, and for such general improvements as public interests may demand. Local funds, collected for local purposes, shall not be diverted to other ends. With such a prudent and honest fiscal administration, it is believed that the needs of the government will in a short time become compatible with a considerable reduction in taxation.

"7. A pure, speedy, and effective administration of justice will be established, whereby the evils of delay, corruption, and exploitation will be effectually eradicated.

"8. The construction of roads, railroads, and other means of communication and transportation, as well as other public works of manifest advantage to the Philippine people, will be promoted.

"9. Domestic and foreign trade and commerce, agriculture, and other industrial pursuits, and the general development of the country in the interest of its inhabitants wil be constant objects of solicitude and fostering care.

"10. Effective provision will be made for the establishment of elementary schools in which the children of the people shall be educated. Appropriate facilities will also be provided for higher education.

"11. Reforms in all departments of the government, in all branches of the public service, and in all corporations closely touching the common life of the people must be undertaken without delay and effected, conformably to right and justice, in a way that will satisfy the well-founded demands and the highest sentiments and aspirations of the Philippine people."

Such is the spirit in which the United States comes to the people of the Philippine Islands. His Excellency the President has instructed the Commission to make it publicly known. And in obeying this behest the Commission desire to join with His Excellency the President in expressing their own good will toward the Philippine people, and to extend to their leading and representative men a cordial invitation to meet them for personal acquaintance and for the exchange of views and opinions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if no Senator is prepared to discuss the unfinished business this afternoon, I should like to call up the union railroad station bill for further consideration.

Mr. LODGE. If no Senator on either side is ready to continue the debate, I have no objection at all, and would be very glad to concur in the request of the Senator from New Hampshire. It is desirable to have that bill disposed of as soon as possible.

RELIEF OF CITIZENS OF FRENCH WEST INDIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

One of the greatest calamities in history has fallen upon our neighboring island of Martinique. The consul of the United States at Guadeloupe has telegraphed from Fort de France, under date of yesterday, that the disaster is complete; that the city of St. Pierre has ceased to exist, and that the American consul and his family have perished. He is informed that 30,000 people have lost their lives, and that 50,000 are homeless and hungry; that there is urgent need of all kind of provisions, and that the visit of vessels for the work of supply and rescue is imperatively required.

The Government of France, while expressing their thanks for the marks of sympathy which have reached them from America, inform us that Fort de France and the entire island of Martinique are still threatened. They therefore request that, for the purpose of rescuing the people who are in such deadly peril and threatened with starvation, the Government of the United States may send as soon as possible the means of transporting them from the stricken island. The island of St. Vincent, and perhaps others in that region, are also seriously menaced by the calamity which has taken so appalling a form in Martinique.

I have directed the Departments of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy to take such measures for the relief of these stricken people as lies within the Executive discretion, and I earnestly commend this case of unexampled disaster to the generous consideration of the Congress. For this purpose I recommend that an appropriation of $500,000 be made, to be immediately available.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 12, 1902.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed with amendments the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 4992) to provide an American register for the bark Homeward Bound;

A bill (S. 5736) for the relief of the citizens of the French West Indies;

A joint resolution (S. R. 82) providing for the printing annually of franks required for sending out seed;

A joint resolution (S. R. 91) providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 92) providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse.

RELIEF OF CITIZENS OF FRENCH WEST INDIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5736) for the relief of the citizens of the French West Indies.

The amendment of the House was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

To enable the President of the United States to procure and distribute among the suffering and destitute people of the islands of the French West Indies such provisions, clothing, medicine, and such other necessary articles, and to take such other steps as he shall deem advisable for the purpose of rescuing and succoring the people who are in peril and threatened with starvation, the sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

In the execution of this act the President is requested to ask and obtain the approval of the French Government, and he is hereby authorized to employ any vessels of the United States Navy, and to charter and employ any other suitable steamship or vessels.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CULLOM. As the Senate knows, a message has just come from the President suggesting an appropriation of $500,000. That message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Whatever may be the action of that committee hereafter upon the question, I think it will be well that the amount proposed by the House be agreed to without delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

UNION RAILROAD STATION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for this purpose?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] has agreed to an amendment that the chairman of the committee, who is absent from the city on a painful errand, intended to propose. I consulted with the Senator from Colorado only two hours ago. Under those circumstances I feel sure that the Senator is not disposed to press the amendment he offered. I do not feel quite at liberty to recommend any action upon it; of course I could not withdraw it in his name; but I hope that the amendment which I now hold in my hand will be acted on and that the amendment heretofore proposed by the Senator from Colorado may be allowed to remain for the present unacted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none. The Senator from New Hampshire offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 13, the last section of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 13. That any railroad company now or hereafter lawfully existing and authorized to extend a line of railroad, and having in fact extended such line, or secured the right by agreement to operate over the lines of any other then-existing railroad, to a point of connection with the tracks of said terminal company, shall have the right to the joint use of said station and terminal upon terms substantially as favorable as those which may then be accorded to any other railroad company using the said station and terminal; and if the parties be unable to agree upon such terms, then the same shall be prescribed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 14. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have had no time to look at the proposed amendment. As read it would seem to be sufficient. I understand from the reading that it lets any company in by paying properly, and if the parties do not agree they can go to the court.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is precisely what the amendment does. I will say to the Senator that his colleague has examined it very carefully and has twice assured me that it is very satisfactory.

Mr. TELLER. I have not heard anything about it; but if it accomplishes the object, that is all we want.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer another amendment, which has been submitted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and has received their assent. I think it is an entirely proper amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, on page 3, line 16, after the word "Maryland," it is proposed to insert:

And to acquire from time to time such lands between Montana and Florida avenues and east of the present Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad as it may need for sidings, switches, yard tracks, with suitable structures and appliances, and other proper corporate purposes in connection therewith, and to use the same accordingly, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all the amendments that the committee have to offer to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I think that a bill of this importance deserves to be debated. I do not propose to offer any factious opposition to the bill, but, to my mind, it ought not to pass.

I have given the bill a great deal of consideration. In a word, we are appropriating to a corporation in round numbers about $7,000,000 and giving that corporation a perpetual right to the railroad facilities of the District of Columbia. I do not believe that we ought to do a thing of that kind without thorough consideration and without full debate. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that fully 90 per cent of the people of the District of Columbia are opposed to this measure. The railroad committee of the board of trade of this city have held numerous meetings on the subject and have passed resolutions against it. I understand the board of trade itself is soon to meet to consider it.

When this measure was before the Senate a few days ago I ventured to offer some remarks on the question. I then stated that it was the practice of railroad companies in the West, particularly of the Northern Pacific Railroad, the Great Northern Railroad, and other great transcontinental lines, not only to construct their own depots and pay for them, but in many instances to purchase the land upon which those depots were located. I think there were some exceptions with respect to the purchase of land.

Since then I have been making further inquiries, and I find in the city of Seattle, in the State of Washington, that the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific railroads, coming into that city, have purchased a site for their depot and are not asking a single dollar from the city of Seattle. Not only is it their purpose to purchase and pay for the site for a depot, but it is also their purpose to build the depot. In addition to that, they are to run a tunnel under the city of Seattle and pay for that; so that the improvements will not cost the city of Seattle a single dollar.

Mr. President, this is the condition of things which prevails in the Western part of the country; and I do not see why we here, in the capital of the United States, should contribute to the extent of nearly $7,000,000 to a rich corporation and give them a perpetual right to control the railroad facilities of the capital of the United States.

We all agree, Mr. President, that there should be a union station in Washington; that the several railroads coming in here should come into the city and deposit their passengers at one place. There is no disagreement as to that, but the plan which is proposed in the pending measure is not the proper one.

I call the attention of Senators to the fact that by this legislation we propose to contribute to a railroad corporation nearly $7,000,000, and to give them a perpetual right to control the railroad facilities of the District of Columbia. That, in a word, is what this measure means; and I say it is serious enough to command the attention of every Senator.

Some Senators have said to me in conversing with them on this question that they did not think it advisable to enter upon a policy which recognized municipal ownership. Perhaps, Mr. President, there are objections to such a policy, but I have observed in my investigations that the great city of Boston has entered upon a policy of municipal ownership, and with great profit to the city, I will say; and to-day no street railroad in the city of Boston can get a perpetual franchise, to say nothing of a cash bonus, from the city.

Some years ago a subway was constructed in the city of Boston by the municipal authorities, and the street railroad companies which are using that subway to-day are paying the city at the rate of about 5 per cent on the investment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the subway is simply for electric cars?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It does not make a particle of difference whether it is for electric cars or for steam cars. It is a plain business proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection to the Senator making that statement, but I do not want the Senator to say that no railroads have rights beyond municipal ownership in the city of Boston. Two great terminal railroad companies in Boston have precisely the same rights that are guaranteed under this bill to the four or five or six railroads that come into this city.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have no doubt that is true; but the trouble about it is that the city of Boston did not start early enough with their plan of municipal ownership.

Mr. GALLINGER. Probably not.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The steam railroads got there before the people were aware of their duty in the premises. We should not neglect our duty because the people of some other city neglected theirs. Boston, however, has recently adopted the right policy and is profiting thereby.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the great State of Massachusetts started in on this policy when they built the Hoosac Tunnel; but they did not make it pay, and they leased it to a private company, which is now running it. The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggests to me that they sold it.

I say to the Senator, further, when he asserts that the subway in the city of Boston is immensely profitable to the city, that I have no assurance that that is the fact, and I think the Senator will have to produce his figures before he can substantiate that statement.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator will produce them in due time.

Before I leave that subject, I desire to say to the Senator that I did not say that the subway enterprise in Boston was immensely profitable. I said distinctly that it was returning a revenue of about 5 per cent on the money invested.

Since that subway was put in by the city one of the electric railroads of the city of Boston secured the passage of a bill through the legislature of Massachusetts providing for a second subway, and offering the city of Boston $6,000,000 for a forty years' lease of that subway, and Governor Crane—and I call the particular attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact—Governor Crane vetoed the bill, because he said he thought that was a very poor business policy and would be a poor investment, although the railroad company proposed to pay $6,000,000 cash for a forty years' lease of that subway, and in his veto message he referred to the fact, which I have just stated, that the city had built one subway and was receiving a return of about 5 per cent on the amount invested, and he pointed distinctly to the experience of the city in that respect to support the veto message of the bill to which I have referred.

So that municipal ownership, to that extent at least, has been a success in the city of Boston, and why should it not be a success in the capital of the United States, especially where we are proposing deliberately to vote about $7,000,000 in money and property and give to a corporation a perpetual right to these privileges? That is all there is to this argument. It is a plain business proposition whether the Congress of the United States desires to thus extravagantly vote away the people's money.

Mr. President, I have a very large amount of data and facts here which I might use to sustain the point I have made, but I am not one of those who desire to take up the time of the Senate.

I propose, if it is now in order, to offer a substitute for this bill. The provisions of the proposed substitute are briefly these: That instead of paying this corporation $7,000,000 we provide a commission, at the head of which shall be the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, and that we give authority to the District to bond itself for $10,000,000, which is only $3,000,000 more than we are proposing to give to this corporation, and that the District of Columbia, through this commission, shall construct this monumental union station, and take control and charge of the station instead of turning it over to the corporation. That is all there is in this case. It is a serious matter, and Senators ought to consider it as I have tried to consider it.

I am not one of those, Mr. President, who rail at corporations. I think that it can not be charged that I am on my feet here denouncing corporations. I am not now denouncing this corporation. I speak of it as one corporation because there is but one railroad corporation in the city of Washington, and that is the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, a great railroad, a great institution, running, I think, the finest trains on this continent and operating the finest railroad property on this continent, I believe. They have made a great success of it, and I am glad of it, and their stock to-day is worth 150 or more in the market, and yet they come here to Congress and ask us to give them $7,000,000 to do what I think they ought to do of their own accord.

When this matter was up at a meeting of the Committee on the District of Columbia about ten days ago, there appeared before the committee the president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, who was formerly connected with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and also the vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, Mr. Green. Mr. Green made a statement to the committee.

I betray no confidence in repeating in substance what he said. It was to the effect that the railroad company accepted this proposed legisislation with great reluctance; that they did not care whether it passed or not; but, so long as the Committee on the District of Columbia seemed to desire that it should pass, they would acquiesce in it. At that point I asked Mr. Green if he did not think it would be better policy if the District of Columbia should itself construct this union station, and Mr. Green said that he would be delighted if it should do so, and he spoke for his company when he said so. He said that he would be delighted if the District of Columbia would undertake this enterprise.

So, Mr. President, I have the Pennsylvania Company with me on this proposition. They are willing for the District of Columbia to go into this enterprise. They do not demand that the Government shall pay this $7,000,000. According to Mr. Green's statement, they are willing that we should retain the $7,000,000; and by the provisions of this proposed substitute, I will say that the purpose is that we shall add to it about $3,000,000 for the District of Columbia to construct this station and operate it.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the entire appropriation the Senator proposes to make in the substitute offered by him?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. About $10,000,000—only $3,000,000 more than we now propose to give to this company.

Mr. SPOONER. And the Pennsylvania Railroad Company are to pay for the terminal facilities afforded them?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is precisely like the plan in the city of Boston, where the municipality receives from its subway, in the way of rental, a return of about 5 per cent on the investment.

Mr. SPOONER. How would the amount of the rental be ascertained? Is it to be agreed upon between the parties?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is a matter that will be left entirely in the hands of the commission provided for in the proposed substitute, the commission consisting of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, the engineer of the District of Columbia, and two private citizens appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that to be a permanent commission?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. A permanent commission undoubtedly, because it will probably take 35 or 40 years to discharge this debt of $10,000,000.

Mr. SPOONER. Are they to go on and fix the rental?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. They are to fix the rentals.

Mr. SPOONER. And it is to be done by agreement between the commission and the railway companies?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Undoubtedly they would have the authority to do that.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose they disagree?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin, schooled, as he is, in railroad law and the examination of witnesses, can undoubtedly find a great many flaws in any measure that he undertakes to discuss.

Mr. SPOONER. I only asked a question.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not pretend to say that the substitute I propose is absolutely perfect. I insist merely upon the principle that it is the duty of the District of Columbia to do this, to save this $7,000,000, and to retain the control of the railway situation. That is all.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think a man would have to know very much about law, railroad law or any other kind, to warrant him in asking a question. I merely asked a question of the Senator. I do not know what the Senator's substitute bill provides in that respect or whether it ought to be amended, for I have not had an opportunity to read it, and do not know what provision it makes in such a contingency as I have suggested.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the Senator will find if he will send and get a copy of the proposed substitute—it was introduced several days ago as a separate bill—that that has been provided for.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Senate bill No. 5586. I have, since it was printed, made certain amendments to conform to existing law.

Mr. President, this is so serious a matter that it seemed to me that I would not be performing my duty if I did not make the statements I have made here.

In connection with what I have said, I desire to have printed a statement which has been indorsed and adopted by the railroad committee of the board of trade, so that Senators when they read the RECORD to-morrow can see it for themselves. The board of trade is a District institution, and the railroad committee of the board of trade is composed of the leading business men of the city of Washington, men who make close calculations, and who understand these questions. I have here the statement which they have indorsed, and which they have adopted.

The paper referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1902.

To the Washington Board of Trade:

Your committee on railroads, having considered Senate bill 4825, to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, reports as follows:

That with the purpose of the bill they heartily concur, and believe that the national capital should have a monumental union passenger depot, and that the railroads should relieve the city of grade crossings, but that the bill, while the best so far proposed for the relief of the present railroad situation, can be improved in certain particulars.

The measure proposed a railroad monopoly, and should be amended to permit the use of the proposed terminals by any railroad entering the District of Columbia, and thereby provide an open door to the national capital.

It also proposes that the railroads be given $6,792,521 for making the alterations in their terminals, of which amount the District of Columbia is to pay $2,804,000, as follows: One million six huudred thousand dollars for the plaza in front of the depot; $170,000 for changes in South Washington, paving, and damage to property; $750,000 bonus to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and $284,000 as its half of the cost of the highway bridge.

The $1,454,000 given in real estate is largely in streets closed, which belong to the United States, but are a loss to the citizens of the District rather than the United States. The right of way for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad through the Reform-School grounds is a loss to a District institution, unestimated in any of the reports, and the damage to property abutting on streets closed by the bill is entirely unprovided for and must fall on the owners, citizens of the District.

The cost of the highway bridge, if properly constructed, is estimated by the War Department to be $996,000, instead of the $568,000 already appropriated, so that the estimated cost to the District is too little in this instance and may be too small in other particulars. It is probable that the District contribution to the railroad improvements will not be less than $4,000,000.

At a time when needed improvements such as the filtration plant, the memorial bridge, the extension of Sixteenth street, and the Park Commission and street extension plans have to wait for want of funds it is a serious matter for the District to have to give $4,000,000.

Your committee has investigated the method pursued by Boston in improving its railroad system, and believes that if a similar course was pursued here it would result in a great saving to the community. The subways there have been built by the city and rented to the railroads on such terms that the sinking fund created by the rentals will pay off the bonds issued in about thirty years. The railroads, not the taxpayer, at the end of that period will have paid for the subways, but the taxpayer, not the railroad, will own them.

The present experience of Baltimore with its investment in the Western Maryland Railway is also worthy of your careful consideration at this time. In assisting the construction of that road to the city stocks and bonds of the corporation were taken to represent the money advanced and were held at a loss of interest to the city for years, but now railroad interests have bought them, and the city will get its debt and interest and the long-sought terminals in Jones Falls Valley without further cost.

In Washington, as consideration for the $4,000,000 which will probably be spent, we are not even to have a share of stock in the terminal company authorized by the bill to be formed. While the bill provides for the taxation of the land occupied for railway purposes, and in this way will produce a few thousand dollars of revenue annually, the amount so paid would not equal the first cost to the Government within a hundred years.

Your committee therefore recommends the adoption of the following:

"Resolved, That the board of trade believes that in the construction of the railroad terminals for the District of Columbia, a plan similar to that followed by the city of Boston in the construction of its subway should be adopted, whereby the municipality owns the improvement and rents it to the railroad companies on such terms that the sinking fund provided retires the bonds issued to defray costs in thirty years; and that a railroad commission should be provided for the District of Columbia, to do the work and determine whether the location of the terminals desired by the railroads is best for its various interests."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Further than that, Mr. President, I want also to insert in the RECORD, if I may be allowed to do so, the veto message of Governor Crane, of Massachusetts. It is well worth reading; it is full of instruction, and I think that no Senator on this side of the Chamber will say that Governor Crane is imbued with socialistic ideas. Governor Crane is a Republican, and he is one of the great governors which the State of Massachusetts has had—a very able man.

Only recently he was offered a position in the Cabinet of the President of the United States, which he declined. I think his message on this question would be most interesting if Senators here would take the trouble to read it. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the message of Governor Crane on the Boston subway bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The paper referred to is as follows:

VETO OF BOSTON SUBWAY—GOVERNOR CRANE STATES HIS REASONS—"IT INVOLVES A SURRENDER OF PUBLIC RIGHTS FOR AN UNUSUAL TERM OF YEARS."

The following is the text of Governor Crane's message to the Massachusetts legislature, vetoing the Boston subway bill (H. No. 1449):

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, Boston, June 18, 1901.

The Honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval an act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a system of subways in the city of Boston by the Boston Transit Commission," with my objections thereto in writing:

A TYPICAL JOB DESCRIBED.

The bill authorizes the Boston Transit Commission to construct a subway, with several important branches, under or near Washington street, from Broadway to the north end of the city of Boston, the entire expense thereof and all damages arising thereby to be paid by the city of Boston. It is provided that the Boston Elevated Railway Company shall pay to the city a sum not exceeding $6,000,000 toward the payment of all expenses and damages incurred in carrying out the provisions of the bill, and shall have as compensation therefor the free and exclusive use and occupation of the subway for a term of forty years.

I am aware that in section 15 it is provided that the entire cost of the new subway, the expense of its maintenance and all repairs of whatever nature during the term of the lease, shall be paid by the company; but this language is not sufficient to modify the explicit provisions of section 10, that the contribution of the company shall not exceed $6,000,000. The provisions of section 10 operate as a distinct limitation upon the provisions of section 13, and in no event can the Boston Elevated Railway Company be required to pay more than the sum named in section 10.

This amounts to a lease of the proposed subway when constructed to the Boston Elevated Railway Company for a gross rental of $6,000,000, paid in advance. If the cost of the subway does not exceed $6,000,000, this rental, on the basis of 4½ per cent, the rate of the lease of the existing subway, taking into consideration the advantageous investment of the sinking fund provided for by the bill, would enable the company to make itself whole in from thirty-two to thirty-five years, and would give to the Boston Elevated Railway Company the free and exclusive use of a great artery of public travel for from five to eight years without any compensation whatever.

It is fair to assume that the sinking fund would be invested so as to bring about this result, but if not so invested the rental for the term would not exceed 4½ per cent, the minimum rental of the Tremont street subway; but the lease of the latter provides also for an increase of the rent proportioned to the amount of business done by the lessee. There is no such provision in the lease authorized by this bill. However much the volume of transportation may increase the lessee, not the city, will receive the benefit. This provision, which is omitted in the present bill, making the amount of rent proportionate to the volume of business, is wise and equitable.

But there is no assurance that the subway can be constructed for $6,000,000. If, as is very likely to be the case, the cost is in excess of that sum, not only is the rental of the subway proportionately decreased, but the excess must be paid by the city without reimbursement from any source. To the extent of such excess of cost the subway will be constructed at the expense of the city for the benefit of the proposed lessee.

Under the terms of the bill the Boston Elevated Railway Company has three months in which to accept its provisions, and it does not become a law unless so accepted by the company. No such privilege is given to the city. Such a discrimination in favor of one of the two parties affected by the bill is, in my opinion, unjust and unwarranted.

THE REFERENDUM APPROVED.

Previous legislatures have referred to the city of Boston, for its acceptance or rejection, acts relating to rapid transit, and the results of the ballots so taken show that the voters have acted intelligently and with a full understanding of the issues involved. In the year 1893 two acts were passed, one providing for the construction of an elevated railway and the other for a subway. Both were conditioned upon their acceptance, the former by the voters of the city of Boston, the latter by the city council. The elevated railway bill was rejected by the voters, but the subway bill was accepted by the city council.

The subway bill of 1893, however, was found to be inadequate, and a more comprehensive act was passed in 1894. This act also contained a referendum clause, and it was accepted by the voters. In 1899 a statute was enacted providing for the restoration of the surface tracks to Tremont and Boylston streets, which, under the provisions of the act of 1894, had been removed. This act also provided for a referendum to the voters of Boston, and was by them rejected. I see no good reason why these precedents should not be followed in a bill so important and far-reaching in its consequences to the citizens of Boston as is the one before me.

STOCK WATERING DENOUNCED.

The bill is objectionable for the further reason that it is in violation of the spirit of the statutes designed to prevent stock watering, laws whose wisdom have been so far confirmed by experience that all attempts to modify or repeal them have failed. The essence of stock watering is, I take it to be, the issuance of stock not based upon actual property of the corporation. This bill provides that the money to be paid to the city of Boston may be provided for by issuing stock; but no provision is made for the redemption or cancellation of the stock at the end of the term.

The money so paid is, in fact, expended not for permanent improvements, but for rentals, and does not increase the value of the plant of the company. At the end of forty years the stock is free, and will be held by the company without property to show for it. There is, it is true, a provision for a sinking fund, but none whatever that the proceeds of the sinking fund shall be used to retire the stock so issued.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP APPROVED.

Section 9 of the bill provides that the title and ownership of the subway shall be and remain in the city. I see no objection to this provision, but by section 22 of the bill it is provided that section 9, among others, shall have the force and effect of a contract between the Commonwealth and the company. There is no good reason why any such contract should exist. On the contrary, there are many reasons of public policy why the Commonwealth should not enter into a binding contract with a private corporation and its lessees, relating to a matter with which the corporation will have no concern after the termination of its lease.

The act of 1894, authorizing the construction of the existing subway, made careful provision in section 30 for the relocation by the commission of sewers, gas pipes, water pipes and other conduits; but the section of the present bill referring to the same subject (section 8) makes no such provision. It authorizes the commission to remove all such structures, but does not provide for their relocation or accommodation, either within or without the new subway; and it is doubtful whether they could be located within the new subway, even if in the judgment of the authorities they could be so placed without detriment to its use by the railway corporation. This, in my mind, is an important omission. The structures to which I refer are allowed to be placed beneath the streets for the public convenience, and explicit provision should be made for a continuance of their rights.

PUBLIC RIGHTS MUST BE PRESERVED.

But there is a still more serious objection to the bill. It involves a surrender of public rights for an unusual term of years, and under unusual conditions. No street railway, with the exception of certain privileges heretofore assured to the West End Street Railway Company and the Boston Elevated Railway Company for special reasons, has other than a revocable franchise in a public way.

But this bill will, if it becomes a law, give to a private corporation a valuable monopoly in a great public thoroughfare, and will perpetuate that monopoly for forty years. It not only binds this generation; it ties the hands of the generation to come. The surrender of rights which belong to the public, even for a brief term of years, should be permitted only after the most careful consideration, and for controlling reasons of public policy; but no exigency has been shown to exist to justify the taking away of such rights from a generation yet unborn.

No reason affecting the public welfare requires the adoption of this extraordinary proposition. The rapid transit of passengers by means of a subway is no longer an experiment. There can be no reasonable doubt that if such a structure be built and paid for by the city it can be leased to a transportation company for a sum amply sufficient to take care of the interest on the money borrowed therefor, and to provide a sinking fund for its ultimate redemption.

The charter of the Boston Elevated Railway Company, giving it certain exclusive rights for a period of twenty-five years, was granted to it chiefly upon the ground that the construction of an elevated railway, and the payment of damages that might accrue to abutters thereby would involve so large an expenditure that capitalists would not be expected to invest their money without some assurance of permanency for a fixed term. The act of 1894 providing for the construction of the present subway authorized the Boston transit commission to lease it for a term of fifty years, but the legislature of 1897 wisely cut down this period from fifty to twenty years. Neither of these grants, therefore, constitutes a sufficient precedent for the long term authorized by this bill.

THE HANDS OF THE COMMUNITY MUST NOT BE TIED.

No one can foresee what advance may be made in the methods and cost of transportation, in the volume of travel, or in the facilities that may be required for its accommodation in the next forty years. The history of passenger transportation during the last forty years, and of the wonderful advance that has been made, not only in the amount of travel, but in the facilities afforded to passengers, is sufficient evidence of our inability to predict the future.

This bill, however, while it does not restrict the company, ties the hands of the community. It will prevent the public from taking advantage of any such improvements in transportation facilities on the proposed route, excepting those that may be deemed by the company advantageous to it. A consideration of the disastrous results which would have followed if exclusive rights had been granted to a street railway company forty years ago to continue until the present time illustrates the limitations which this bill would impose upon the public, and the unwisdom of its enactment.

All the special rights and privileges enjoyed by the Boston Elevated Railway Company will have expired in the year 1922.

It has no moral or equitable claim to a continuance of those privileges, or of any exclusive privileges whatever. There is no good reason why the public should not at that time come into complete possession of its own, to the end that further franchises may then be granted in view of the improvements in the methods of rapid transit which may then have been made, and with the sole object of securing, in the highest degree and at the lowest cost, the convenience of the people of that day. But this bill, if approved, would go far in assuring a continuance of the command of the situation for a period of twenty years more.

Although its rights in the existing subway will have ended, it is not difficult to foresee that a company in exclusive possession for a long term of years of a most important avenue of travel will be in a position to control the situation and to prevent other transportation companies from competing upon equal terms. No such opportunity for control of the situation at that time should be permitted.

I am unable to give my assent to a bill which thus restricts the rights of the public on the one hand, while on the other hand it insures valuable exclusive privileges to the company in question for so long a period, and that, too, without any public exigency requiring the passage of so extraordinary a measure.

W. MURRAY CRANE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. A few days ago I sent my substitute bill to the War Department. I have not yet had a reply from the War Department, and I think the War Department should have something to say about this matter. It seems to me that it is important not only to the country at large, but to the capital of the United States, that the War Department should have some sort of control over the railroad facilities within the District of Columbia. For that reason I sent the substitute to the War Department.

I should be glad if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], in view of the importance of this question, in view of the importance of the statement of the Board of Trade, the very interesting message of Governor Crane on this subject, and the fact that I have not yet had a reply from the War Department to my communication, would allow this bill to go over for a day or two.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I have a report from the War Department that came to me through the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which I intend to put into the RECORD. I shall be glad to hand it to the Senator now.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Is that in reply to the bill which was submitted to the War Department?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. We have not had an opportunity to examine this paper, and I do not want the Senator from New Hampshire to think for a moment that I would delay legislation.

Mr. President, this matter appeals to me. I have given it a great deal of thought; I have delved late at night into the records to find what this thing means, and I think Senators here who are voting away the money of the United States should do likewise. For that reason I hope the Senator will not press the consideration of this bill to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust the Senator will offer his substitute.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I now offer, send to the Secretary's desk, and ask that it may be read, the proposed substitute for the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota offers an amendment to the pending bill, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, the United States Commissioner of Railroads, and two citizens of the United States to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of four years, are hereby constituted a railroad commission in and for the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of said railroad commission for the District of Columbia immediately upon the passage of this act to begin the construction of a monumental union passenger station, a railroad and highway bridge across the Potomac River, and railroad terminals, including separate freight depots for each railroad demanding them, within the District of Columbia, for the use of all the steam railroads now in said District or that may hereafter enter under the terms and conditions hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 3. That said commission shall purchase, in the name of the District of Columbia, all land necessary for said monumental union passenger station, said bridge, and railroad terminals in the locations said commission may determine on, subject to the approval of Congress.

SEC. 4. That if the commission can not agree with the owner thereof for the purchase of any land herein authorized to be taken, or if the owner be the District of Columbia or the United States, a married women, infant, non compos mentis, or out of the District, said commission may apply to the supreme court of the District of Columbia by petition for the condemnation of such land, and the proceedings shall be the same as those prescribed for the United States or the District of Columbia in sections 483 to 490 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That for the purpose of providing funds for the construction of said monumental union passenger station, bridge, and railroad terminals herein provided for, the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to issue bonds of the denomination of $100 and over, payable in thirty years, bearing 2 per cent interest per annum, in amount not to exceed $10,000,000, said bonds to be guaranteed by the United States.

SEC. 6. That the said commission, subject to the approval of Congress, shall fix a schedule of tolls for passenger and freight traffic, upon the payment of which any railroad entering the District of Columbia or that may hereafter enter said District may use said monumental union passenger station, bridge, and railroad terminals.

SEC. 7. That said commission shall pay to the District of Columbia all sums received by it, and the said District shall pay from such moneys the cost of maintenance of the said monumental union passenger station, bridge, and railroad terminals, including a salary of $5,000 to each of the hereinbefore provided commissioners to be appointed from civil life, and all other moneys, including any premiums which shall be received from the sale of bonds hereinbefore provided for, shall be set aside by the said District as a sinking fund, and shall be used as it may seem wise from time to time to purchase any of the bonds hereinbefore provided for.

SEC. 8. That all damages to adjacent or contiguous property resulting from and incidental to or connected with the construction of said monumental union passenger station, bridge, and railroad terminals authorized by this act shall be paid by the District of Columbia from the funds hereinbefore provided by the sale of bonds, and shall be recoverable by the owners of such property as is damaged by action at law in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against the hereinbefore provided railroad commissioners.

SEC. 9. That as soon as the said commission has constructed the monumental union passenger station, bridge, and railroad terminals, the right of any steam railroad to the use of any street, avenue, or land belonging to the District of Columbia or to the United States shall cease, and they shall remove their tracks therefrom, and from the streets or avenues any building they may have erected thereon, and should they fail so to do, the said commission shall remove the same and charge the cost thereof as part of the rent for the said monumental union passenger station, bridge, and railroad terminals.

SEC. 10. That the acts of Congress approved February 12, 1901, entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings on the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company in the city of Washington, D. C., and requiring said company to depress and elevate its tracks and to enable it to relocate parts of its railroads therein, and for other purposes," and entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings of railroads in the District of Columbia, to require and authorize the construction of new terminals and tracks for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in the city of Washington, and for other purposes," and all other acts or parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am very sorry indeed that the matter of municipal ownership has come up in connection with the pending bill. It has been heretofore agitated in reference to a great many things, but up to the present time Congress has not felt like entering upon that experiment, and I trust Congress may not enter upon it in connection with this great public improvement.

That there may be no mistake as to the attitude of the War Department and the District Commissioners on the substitute which has just been read, I desire to read the following letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers, it having been addressed to the Secretary of War by that official, to whom it was referred:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, May 9, 1902.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith a letter, dated the 7th instant, from the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, inclosing for the views of the War Department thereon S. 5586, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session—

"A bill to establish a railroad commission for the District of Columbia, and authorizing said commission to construct a monumental union passenger station and railroad terminals for the said District, and for other purposes."

The object of the bill is stated in the title, and its provisions appear to be clearly expressed and well adapted to effectuate such object.

Regarding the merits of the proposed legislation and the propriety of its enactment, I do not feel competent to express an opinion. Undoubtedly the purpose sought to be accomplished is one of great public interest and of considerable importance, not only to the people of the District, but to all who have interest in improved traveling facilities at the national capital. It appears to me, however, that the subject-matter is not one that touches any interests peculiarly under the control of this Department, but that it pertains more particularly to the District government.

So far as the proposition contained in the bill making the Chief of Engineers a member of the proposed railroad commission is concerned, I have the honor to say that while I am not sure of the appropriateness of such an assignment, considering the large amount of work now devolving upon him, I recognize the fact that it is within the province of Congress, in its wisdom, to impose the additional duty on that officer.

A copy of the bill has been referred to the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, who states that he knows of no objection to a favorable consideration of the bill by Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. MACKENZIE,
Acting Chief of Engineers.

The bill was also referred to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, to whom, manifestly, it ought to have gone in the first instance; and the Commissioners, after discussing the legislation of a year and a half ago, which they had recommended, and which now is on the statute books, giving to these two railroad corporations the right to build two stations, practically on the sites that they now occupy and granting them each a million and a half of dollars from the funds of the Government and the District for the elimination of grade crossings, turn to this proposed substitute and say about it as follows:

If it is intended to enact Senate bill 5586, it should, in the opinion of the Commissioners, be amended in a number of its provisions. The method of condemnation of land proposed is not that which has proved most satisfactory in this jurisdiction; in fact, it is entirely novel. It is believed by the Commissioners that the method of condemnation should be that contained in chapter 15 of the code of the District of Columbia.

The bill is indefinite in not stating just exactly where the terminals should extend; it is presumed that they would provide for all the present railroad tracks within the District. It also makes no provision for reimbursing the railroad companies for the decrease in the value of their present real estate holdings when their tracks are removed, nor does it provide penalties for failure to remove their tracks, although such removal is required. Neither does it require the removal of their buildings from the streets, avenues, and public lands belonging to the United States and the District of Columbia.

It is difficult for the Commissioners to present a satisfactory report upon the proposed legislation in the brief period of time allotted to them for that purpose, but they can not recommend the enactment of this proposed legislation.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply desire to say, in response to what the Senator has read, that of course neither the War Department nor the District Commissioners would undertake to advise Congress or even to indicate to Congress its duty in the premises. This municipal ownership is a departure; it is a new policy——

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. So far as the District of Columbia is concerned, and of course the War Department and the District Commissioners would not interfere with that. I will say further—and I will occupy only a moment—that so far as the suggestions made by the District Commissioners with respect to this bill are concerned, I have adopted most of the suggestions and placed them in the bill as it has been read at the desk. I think they are very valuable suggestions, and I have adopted them and they are in the substitute as it is now before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not intend to take much time in discussing the pending bill. It was discussed a few days ago pretty thoroughly, but I want to allude to two or three salient points.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] puzzles me very much in his attitude on this bill. A year and a half ago we had the proposition before the Committee on the District of Columbia to eliminate the grade crossings in this District and to direct that two new railroad stations should be built in the city of Washington.

For twenty years there had been an agitation in the press of this city and in the commercial bodies of this city and among the people that these deadly grade crossings should be eliminated. When the committee came to investigate the matter they found that in all the great cities of the country the cost of eliminating grade crossings was divided between the municipality and the railroad corporation—in some instances between the State, the municipality, and the corporation; and the plan that was adopted in the bills that are now on the statute books followed out that idea and required the District of Columbia and the Government of the United States to pay a portion of the cost of eliminating these grade crossings. There was no objection to that legislation. The Senator from North Dakota gave it his cordial assent, and those bills became law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, the Senator does not desire, of course, to do me an injustice.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly not.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator knows very well that when measures of this kind are up in the District Committee, the Senator himself being a member of the railroad subcommittee of that committee—and I am not a member or that subcommittee—members of the committee usually defer to the judgment of that subcommittee.

The Senator will recall that when the bills to which he refers were considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia there was but very little discussion, as far as I know, at least, on the bills. They came in here—we all having great confidence in the chairman of the committee and in the Senator from New Hampshire. Now, when the bills came into this body, if I am not very seriously mistaken, there was no record vote. They went through here under a pressure at the close of the session, as hundreds of other bills go through, so that there was no yea-and-nay vote. There was no discussion on this great question such as there should have been then, and such as there should be now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not misrepresented and I will not misrepresent the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I know the Senator will not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Those bills were considered for a long time in the committee, and they were discussed in this Chamber, and after a full discussion they were passed.

Now, Mr. President, what did that legislation do, and what is the legislation under which these railroad corporations can proceed at the present time if they see fit? The Senator from North Dakota says there is but one railroad corporation. I had supposed that was true; that is, I had supposed that the Pennsylvania Railroad controlled the Baltimore and Ohio, until a meeting that was had by the Committee on the District of Columbia the other day showed very clearly the fact that those railroad corporations are distinct at the present time.

Four gentlemen connected with the Pennsylvania Railroad are in the directory of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which consists of 12 members. They can be ousted at any moment. So the vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad stated and so the president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad stated.

Mr. President, we granted those corporations each a million and a half dollars.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me just there?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not want to disturb the Senator all the time, but of course the officials of the Pennsylvania road would not admit anywhere that they had purchased a majority of the stock of the Baltimore and Ohio, because if they did they would be liable to prosecution under the Sherman law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not believe Mr. Green, the vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and Mr. Loree, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, stated a falsehood to the committee. If the Senator believes that, he is welcome to the belief. I do not believe it.

Now, Mr. President, under the existing statutes we have granted the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad $1,500,000, to be paid equally by the Government and the District of Columbia, for the elimination of grade crossings. We granted the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, known as the Pennsylvania Railroad, land to the value of a million and a half dollars; so that they might extend their operations in the Mall to a greater extent than they exist to-day.

Under those statutes these two roads can proceed to build railroad depots, but before they commenced operations it was deemed desirable to make a special effort to have a union station in the city of Washington, something that the eyes of the people have been turned to for a great many years; and under the very able and wise management of the chairman of this committee—and no one regrets his absence more than I do to-day, because I wish he was in charge of this bill in the place of myself—he secured the assent of these two railroad corporations to the construction of a union station.

The present bill provides simply that the amount granted to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad station shall stand; that instead of the land, amounting to a million and a half of dollars, granted to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad station, that railroad shall be granted that amount in cash. Then the Baltimore and Potomac station vacates the Mall and that land reverts to the United States Government. In addition to that, Mr. President, it is provided that the District of Columbia——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, those of us who are not on the committee are of course not as familiar with this matter as we would otherwise be. I should like the Senator, before he passes from the item he has just mentioned, to give to those of us who are not informed the amounts which are to be paid by the Government, either by the General Government or by the District government, and the reasons therefor. I really do not know myself what is the basis of the amount to be paid.

Mr. GALLINGER. They were granted, Mr. President, by legislation that now exists, on the hypothesis that it was proper that the District and the Government should make a contribution toward the elimination of grade crossings in this city, just as has been done in Boston, just as has been done in New York, just as has been done in Philadelphia. Philadelphia paid $1,020,000 toward eliminating the grade crossings on a single railroad, which is inconsequential compared to these great railroad corporations.

The State of New York pays a part of the expense, and the city of New York pays a part of the expense, amounting in the aggregate to about one half, and the railroad corporations the other half, toward the elimination of grade crossings in that city. It was upon that hypothesis that these contributions were made, and for no other purpose.

Mr. President, I want to say that those contributions were made and the bills have been enacted into law, and under those bills these railroad corporations can proceed to build two railroad stations, which they say they prefer to do rather than build a union station, which will cost a gread deal more money; and they get these donations, if you choose to call them so, that were made by Congress.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I do not exactly understand this proposition. If I understand the Senator, we agreed to give a million and a half dollars to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to change its depot.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, toward the elimination of grade crossings.

Mr. CLAY. If I understand that act, we at the same time provided that certain property which the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad owned should be deeded to the Government of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not recall that.

Mr. CLAY. I think that is true. I think the act provided for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. CLAY. I think it provides that when it changes its depot it shall make a deed to the Government of certain property.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but it gets other land for it—erecting its depot. It simply was going to change its depot from the present site to the junction of Delaware avenue.

Mr. CLAY. As I understand, the act to give them a million and a half dollars was passed in the last Congress, was it not?

Mr. GALLINGER. A year and a half ago.

Mr. CLAY. Again, I understand that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad is to leave its present location—that is, the ground it occupies belonging to the Government? That ground is to revert to the Government?

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. CLAY. And we pay for the ground a million and a half dollars to that railroad?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not for the ground; but toward the elimination of grade crossings.

Mr. CLAY. Now, I will ask the Senator, is it not true that the act itself says that the Government permits the railroad to use this land for railroad and depot purposes only, and is it not clearly true under the law that if they cease to use it it will revert back to the Government?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, without going back to the original grant to that railroad, which was in the year 1872—and the railroad has paid taxes on the property ever since—if the Senator will read the statute of a year and a half ago I think he will come to the conclusion that the railroad has some rights.

Mr. CLAY. I agree with the Senator in this: If we gave them the right to put a track there and the right to put a depot there, and they made improvements and intended to keep those improvements there, there would be an equity, and we would not have the right to take charge of those improvements. I think that is certainly correct; but, as I understand it, they move away their improvements. They do not desire to use the land any further. They have had the use of the land for a period of twenty-five or thirty years without paying anything for it. We now simply pay them a million and a half dollars, and we also have permitted them to use the land for nothing, and they get the improvements, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia must not lose sight of the fact that the railroad company has not asked for the privilege of moving away. The initiation of this matter is in Congress itself. The railroad company has explicitly stated to the committee that they prefer to go and build their two separate depots under the law that was passed a year and a half ago. We have asked them to move away. We have asked them to build one magnificent union station here which will be a credit to the city and to the country and that will be a great convenience to the people. The Senator must remember that under that act of a year and a half ago we gave that corporation additional land in the Mall to be used for railroad purposes.

Mr. CLAY. Is the Senator able to give us the estimate of costs and damages made in regard to the right of way? I believe the District Commissioners make a report as to the sum it will probably cost to erect the depot, and, as I understand it, half of this sum of damages will be paid by the District of Columbia and half by the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. The railroads themselves build and pay for the station. I do not know of anything the District of Columbia or the Government will have to pay aside from the amount that was appropriated in the acts of a year and a half ago for the elimination of grade crossings, except that it is proposed in this bill that the District of Columbia shall make a municipal improvement in front of that building, which improvement is going to cost $1,670,000, and, Mr. President, that the railroad company has not asked for. In fact, the railroad company is quite willing to construct any kind of a station, and, as Mr. Loree said, they prefer a business station to an ornamental station.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me again?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I may not understand this bill. I have only been looking into it to-day, and will read, with his permission, from page 14:

> All damages to adjacent property owners resulting from, incidental to, or connected with changes in the grades of the streets or alleys authorized by this act shall be borne, paid for, and defrayed by the District of Columbia, and shall be recoverable by action of law against the said District on the part of the owners of the property so damaged. Fifty per cent of the amounts so recovered shall be refunded to the said District by the United States: Provided, That in determining the damages as herein provided the jury shall take into consideration any benefits that may have accrued by reason of the location of said station in proximity to the property alleged to have been damaged.

Mr. GALLINGER. I answer that by reading from the report, which is a very carefully prepared report:

> It is further proposed that the District of Columbia shall make suitable approaches to the new station. This is a municipal improvement; it will not increase the revenues of the railroads, but it will conduce to the convenience of the people of the District, of Government officials, and of visitors to the national capital. It is provided that the railroads shall construct so much of the plaza as lies between the building line of Massachusetts avenue and the new station; and, also, that they shall provide for streets on the west side of the station. The cost of these street improvements—

I hope the Senator from Georgia will listen—

> The cost of these street improvements will be $620,000 for grading and paving, $500,000 or less for land, and $550,000 for damages to property due to changes of grade; in all, $1,670,000, the payment of which amount will be spread over a number of years.

Careful estimates have been made, and that is the statement as to the cost for the street improvements around the contemplated station.

Mr. President, this is a large enterprise, and I feel sure that no Senator will approach it in anything but a generous spirit.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is a certain direct appropriation here. Then there is an agreement to pay the damages to certain property holders; and then, as I understand it, there is a proposition to donate the property on which the station is to be built. What I wish to ask the Senator is, what is the total amount of money——

Mr. GALLINGER. The railroads buy almost all the land on which the new station is to stand.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What was in my mind was simply this: What is the total amount the Government and the District will be out, on the one hand, and what are we paying it out for, on the other?

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. Mr. President, there are $3,000,000 which have already been appropriated for the elimination of grade crossings. That amount will continue under the proposed new legislation. It is going to cost $1,670,000 for street improvements, grading and paving, for land and for damages to property, due to change of grade, so that in place of $7,000,000, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] says, the entire amount will be $1,670,000 in excess of the $3,000,000 which were appropriated by the two laws that were enacted a year and a half ago.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Five million dollars, in round numbers?

Mr. GALLINGER. Four million six hundred and seventy thousand dollars.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply desire to state that we appropriated one million and a half in cash to the Baltimore and Ohio by the act of 1901, and we gave no grant of land, but certain rights to the other railroad, which were estimated then at a million and a half, and which they now say they will give up for a million and a half in cash. That is the way the Senator makes his $3,000,000, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. But the railroad company do not now propose to carry out that proposition, nor does the Committee on the District of Columbia propose that they shall carry it out, nor do I want them to carry it out. By the substitute which I have offered here I propose to repeal those two acts which gave them $3,000,000 and put the District of Columbia in the place of the railroads, which will put the Congress of the United States in control of the railroad situation in the District of Columbia instead of the railroad companies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we understand what the Senator proposes to do. His substitute speaks for itself. The Senator talks about Congress giving this railroad corporation $7,000,000 and perpetual rights. Congress practically gives these corporations nothing more than they have under existing law, except that we require the District of Columbia to make certain improvements in the streets and the approaches and to pay certain damages to property. As for perpetual rights, they have those rights under existing legislation, and it is idle to talk about our giving them any additional rights by this legislation. We do nothing of the kind.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand the total amount which we pay out is $4,670,000. The consideration for that, as I understand it, is that we shall have the benefit of a single central great union station?

Mr. GALLINGER. And get rid of grade crossings, which is more important than the rest.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So that is the consideration. We want to understand the question. We have not understood it hitherto.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to what is proposed under this bill, and I do not want to weary the Senate.

The Committee on the District of Columbia may have made a mistake in agreeing that the railroad companies shall build a station such as is contemplated. I do not think any mistake has been made. We are going to beautify Washington. We have a magnificent plan in view. I will not live to see it carried out in its entirety, but somebody will.

We are going to start that plan by building a magnificent union railroad station. The proposition is to build the finest structure in the world as a railroad terminal. I read now from the report:

> Its length will be 760 feet, which is 8 feet 8 inches longer than the Capitol itself. It will be built of white marble, with the interior of marble and stone. The classical style of architecture will be used, and the building will be so located and designed that while distinctly subordinate to the Capitol it will take rank among the great public structures in Washington. The minimum cost of the station has been placed at $4,000,000, but the total cost will be nearer $5,000,000.

Now, let us see what this railroad company proposes to expend:

> The entire cost to the railroads of all the changes that are to be made in the District of Columbia for the elimination of grade crossings and the construction of improved terminals amounts to $6,761,651 for the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, and for the Baltimore and Ohio, $6,599,408, or a total of $12,361,059.
> In addition to this, the District and the United States is to expend on its own property in streets and avenues $1,670,000, thus bringing the total sum of money to be spent for the District to more than $14,000,000.

Mr. President, I do not know that I could elucidate this subject any more clearly if I should talk an hour. It may be there are Senators who do not understand the proposition, but it seems to me it is clear. We are not adopting any new policy in granting money for the elimination of grade crossings. It has been done in every great city in the American Union for the last ten, fifteen, and twenty years. We are not granting as much proportionately as New York, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, Wilmington, and other cities have done.

Grade crossings have been a crying evil in the city of Washington. Anathemas have been thundered from the press ever since I have been in public life against these grade crossings that were endangering human life. No great city has required the railroad corporations to sustain all the cost of eliminating grade crossings, and aside from the fact that we have required the District of Columbia to improve the streets around this magnificent building, to beautify the plaza, to pay some damages to property owners, which in the aggregate will amount to a little over a million and a half of dollars, there is no appropriation in this bill except what was made in the bills of a year and a half ago, which are now on the statute books, and under which these corporations would proceed to build two stations if this legislation is denied to them, or unless the proposition that the Senator from North Dakota has made, which is rather an old proposition in this country, to go into municipal ownership and build this railroad station and require the corporations using it to pay a rental for it, should be adopted.

I do not believe Congress is going to do that. I may be mistaken. If Congress is not going to do that, I submit, Mr. President, that there is no proposition in this bill that ought to lead any Senator to the conclusion that any injustice is done either to the District of Columbia or to the Government of the United States in the amount that has been appropriated toward eliminating grade crossings and toward securing this great public improvement.

The railroad corporation is going to build a tunnel, so that all the roads from the South will approach this great union station under the ground. It is going to cost a million and seven or eight hundred thousand dollars, and they are going to make all these improvements with their own money, with the single exception of the improvement of the space around the station, which the District of Columbia and the Government ought to do, as it is on their own property, and also the amount of money contributed by the District of Columbia and the Government toward getting rid of these deadly grade crossings in the capital city.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that this bill may be passed. I believe it is the initial step in a magnificent development of the national capital. Unless you repeal the laws that were passed a year and a half ago, and that will not be done without a struggle, the defeat of this bill will result in the building of a new railroad station on the Mall, forever shutting up that property against the kind of occupancy that it ought to have, and another new railroad station practically on the old site of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad station. I do not believe we want them. I think we want one magnificent monumental station in the city of Washington that will be an adornment to the capital of the nation, that will be a convenience to all our people, and that will be the first step in the magnificent development of Washington which we all hope to see executed at some time in the future.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Is there any other part of this expenditure to be borne by the District of Columbia except the one he has just indicated?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not a dollar, so far as I know.

Mr. BACON. How much will that be?

Mr. GALLINGER. The District of Columbia is now obligated to pay $1,500,000 under the existing law.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking about the proposed law. What will it be under the proposed law?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, they will be obligated to pay that million and a half dollars, and the delevopment of the plaza and the land damages about the plaza, the opening of streets, etc., is estimated to cost $1,670,000.

Mr. BACON. Are there two items?

Mr. GALLINGER. Those are two items.

Mr. BACON. What is the total?

Mr. GALLINGER. Four million and seventy thousand dollars.

Mr. BACON. That the District of Columbia is to pay?

Mr. GALLINGER. The District of Columbia pays half the cost of the approaches to the new station and half the cost of eliminating grade crossings on the lines of the Baltimore and Ohio.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if the District of Columbia pays any part of the million and a half which is to be paid to the Baltimore and Potomac road for vacating the Mall?

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not. The land reverts to the United States as a portion of the Mall.

Mr. BACON. I should like to have the Senator state in round numbers what will be the total under this proposed law that the District of Columbia will be called on to pay for all the items. I do not ask the Senator to be accurate, but only to state the amount approximately.

Mr. GALLINGER. The District will pay $750,000 to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, which it is obligated to pay under the statute that is now on the statute books.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of the proposed law.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will figure it out in a moment. The District of Columbia will pay one-half the expense of beautifying the plaza. The District will pay one-half and the Government one-half.

Mr. BACON. That is the total?

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the total, aside from the payments of eliminating grade crossings.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator a question purely for information, not for argument. We legislate for the District of Columbia without giving them any participation in that work, but still we endeavor, generally speaking, to ascertain what is the view of those who are interested as property holders with reference to expenditures. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not the business people of the District of Columbia have given any intimation of what their particular wish is in regard to this matter; whether they desire that they shall be burdened with this expense of a million and a half dollars in order that they may have this municipal improvement?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that no citizen of the District of Columbia appeared before the committee to raise an objection to this bill. The Senator from North Dakota said to-day that the railroad committee of the board of trade had resolved against it. That was news to me. But if it is so, the fact is this bill has been pending here for two months; it has been discussed in the newspapers of the city; it has been discussed in the Senate, and no citizen, rich or poor, of the District of Columbia appeared before the committee to say one single word in opposition to it. On the contrary, so far as the committee knows, the press and people of the District are heartily in favor of the project.

Mr. BACON. The Senator, then, is not informed as to what may be the wish of the citizens of this District?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would not influence me a great deal, because I know that a large proportion of the citizens of this District want to have the privilege of voting, but Congress will not give it to them. I know that there are a great many——

Mr. BACON. That would impose upon us a still more imperative obligation to endeavor to carry out their wishes, so far as we can, without injury to the public service.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have always tried to do that, of course. We are always generous toward the District. I feel sure that no harm will ever come to the District from any action, consciously, of the Committee on the District of Columbia as it is now constituted. In the consideration of this measure the committee has kept constantly in view the welfare of the District, as well as the benefit that would come to the country and that would come to the traveling public.

Mr. President, I do not know that I care to say anything more unless a question may be asked. I think I understand this bill reasonably well, and I believe I have stated with accuracy every detail connected with it.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. President, in common with many others I have been interested in this comprehensive plan for beautifying Washington, and when that plan came to be connected with an absolute necessity of providing for additional railroad terminal facilities it still further interested me, so that I have frequently consulted with the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have seen their plans and I have followed out their development. I knew from my own observation, at least, that with the growth of Washington and the immense increase of railroad travel here the terminal facilities for every railroad were entirely inadequate. Additional roads have come in and joined in the use of the terminals, so that it is almost a physical impossibility to handle the trains in and out of Washington to the North, West, and South.

I say I became interested in the beautifying of Washington, and I want to express my approval in the frankest terms of the plan outlined by this committee looking to the future beautifying of this city as a practical business proposition. You may associate with it as much patriotism as you choose, but to make this city conspicuously attractive is a good business proposition for the people who are called upon to pay in taxes in the District toward carrying out that plan.

I knew about the plans agreed upon a year ago with reference to increasing the termini of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company. I knew that within a short time, before many years, even that increase of terminal facilities would be inadequate. Take the comparative growth of the business of the railroads centering here, it is impossible to compute it, discounting the future.

As the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has said, in every large city which is a railroad center in the United States it has become not only a matter of importance but absolutely a necessity to do away with grade crossings. The sacrifice of life is growing until it is enormous, comparatively. Cities and States, as he quoted accurately, are joining in the expense, because it seems to be a duty incumbent upon the public as well as the corporations to provide for the safety of the people who patronize the railroads and who occupy the streets of the city. Chicago, Buffalo, Albany, New York, Boston, and now Washington are taking up that question seriously.

Now, it is my pleasure to have the personal acquaintance of President Cassatt, of the Pennsylvania Railroad. I happened to meet him a day or two ago in a social way, and I want to quote his words in discussing this proposition. He said to me, "We are entirely satisfied by the way in which the Congressional committee met us with reference to increasing our facilities in Washington. We were entirely satisfied that they were dealing with us liberally when they granted us additional room between Sixth and Seventh streets for a depot, and we were prepared to go ahead and build those terminals and, under the law as passed, to elevate our tracks so as to obliterate all grade crossings. We were perfectly satisfied, but," he says, "your chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia approached us with another plan—a plan which has been elaborated in this bill. At first I was opposed to it," President Cassatt said. "I could not see how we could accomplish it physically without an enormous expense, and, speaking for our own property, I was not favorable to it; but under the influence and the inspiration of the men on that committee, who had in view not only the safety connected with this project, but the beautifying of Washington, I became inspired to the extent that I was willing to add two or three million dollars to that expenditure out of pure patriotic feeling toward the scheme which they had brought forward."

Now, as a railroad proposition, in the selfish interests of the railroad corporation, it is a better proposition, if the railroad company would consider only their interests, that the original plan is carried out. It is claimed that this is done under the influence and control of one railroad. Why, Mr. President, there are seven railroads.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me just a moment before he leaves that point?

Mr. HANNA. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator said that in his interview with President Cassatt, President Cassatt said that he was willing to spend two or three million dollars to help out this beautifying project. The Senator from New Hampshire a while ago said that the railroad company would be obliged to spend about $12,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Dakota will not put me in a false position.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I advise the two Senators to get together on their figures.

Mr. HANNA. No; I do not mean to get together with anybody or anything. I said that on my own responsibility.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Cassatt was speaking for the Pennsylvania Railroad. He said there are seven railroads interested in this scheme—the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Chesapeake and Ohio, the Norfolk and Western, the Southern Railway, the Coast Line Railroad, and the Seaboard Air Line. All those railroads have joined in the common cause to make a central union depot. For what? Not, as claimed by the Senator from North Carolina, for their profit or their benefit, but for the accommodation of the public using those roads in and out of Washington. It is a greater accommodation for the public to have a central depot than it would be to have two or three or more depots, and it is fair to state that the money which the United States Government and the District of Columbia are willing to contribute will be more than appreciated when you can measure it by a per centum return from it by the accommodation that it will furnish the public.

Mr. President, as a business proposition it is perfectly absurd to consider a union depot under municipal ownership, managed by commissioners, paid salaries by the Government, to handle the hundreds of railroad trains in and out of that station and over the terminals. If the Government assumes any such responsibility, the Government will be responsible for all the damages and accidents that occur on their property. No railroad, Mr. President, would undertake to occupy a building furnished by the District of Columbia or the Government of the United States to do the immense terminal business that has got to be done here. Somebody has got to take the responsibility of the handling of those trains, and somebody has got to take the responsibility alone and not have any partners in it. Therefore, I suppose, it will organize a terminal company for that purpose.

As far as building a depot for an investment is concerned, I am opposed to any such principle on the part of the Government of the United States or the District of Columbia as far as we have any right to interfere. The proposition made by the railroad companies embodied in this bill gives the right to any legitimate railroad enterprise to use that station, and it is proposed to build it large enough, with sufficient terminal to accommodate the future business of Washington for many years to come.

What is there in the situation, Mr. President, as a business proposition which demands that the District of Columbia or the Government itself shall assume the responsibility of erecting a station? Unless the conditions enjoined upon the railroads were entirely satisfactory to the railroads they would decliine it and go on and construct two depots as now planned; but after weeks and months of honest industrial effort the Committee on the District of Columbia have arrived at and developed a plan which is acceptable to the railroad companies, which is a part of this great enterprise to beautify our city, which will extend the accommodations over years to come, which will benefit the public; and why interfere by any municipal project to stand in the way or delay that work?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in answer to some questions propounded to me by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr.

BACON], and possibly by his colleague [Mr. CLAY], I want to put in the RECORD a statement from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. This paper, Mr. President, is——

Mr. BACON. I hope it made be read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I will read. It is only a few lines. This paper is signed by the three Commissioners, not by one as chairman, as is ordinarily done. The Commissioners say:

The total cost of the changes is estimated as follows:

Work done by the railroad companies	$13,073,103
Work done by the District, with damages to the property	1,770,000
Making a total of	14,843,103

This would be apportioned as follows:

Railroad companies	10,073,103
United States and District of Columbia (Of which the District pays $1,635,000).	4,770,000

The Commissioners say in concluding their report:

The Commissioners are of the opinion that it is for the best interests of the District that this bill shall become a law.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? I want to understand this matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BERRY. As I understand, in the act that was passed a year and a half ago it was provided that the Government would give to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company certain rights to use certain Government land on the condition that they would build a depot, etc. Is that correct?

Mr. GALLINGER. On the condition that they would eliminate grade crossings. The station is a railroad proposition entirely.

Mr. BERRY. Now, do I understand that the railroad company has not complied with those conditions and that it is now proposed to give them a million and a half dollars simply on account of their relinquishing the right which the Government gave them to build a depot on the Mall? Is that correct?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the railroad companies have not been guilty of laches in this matter at all.

Mr. BERRY. That is not the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am going to answer the Senator's question, if he will permit me. The trouble is that when Senators ask a question they do not give a Senator an opportunity to answer them.

Mr. BERRY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to say that the railroad companies have not been guilty of laches; but this matter has rested because the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia requested that it should rest.

As I understand the matter, and I think I state it correctly, the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company for over thirty years has occupied the land upon which their buildings now stand. In the law of a year and half ago we gave them in lieu of cash additional land, estimated to be worth $1,500,000, and we gave to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company $1,500,000 in cash. Then we gave the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company land estimated to be worth $1,500,000. That they relinquish; not only that, but they leave the Mall entirely.

Mr. BERRY. But if the gentleman will permit me, we gave them this land, estimated to be worth a million and a half of dollars, in consideration that they would build a larger depot.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; on the condition that they would abolish grade crossings.

Mr. BERRY. They have not built that depot, and do not intend to build it, and yet you propose to pay them a million and a half dollars because you agreed to give them land for a depot, which they have not built.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I have stated this so often that for the moment I forgot to state it for, probably, the twentieth time. We gave the land to them as a contribution toward the elimination of grade crossings in the District of Columbia, without any reference to railroad stations at all, and that is all we are going to do now.

Mr. BERRY. If I remember, when the Senator spoke on the bill a year and a half ago——

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not say a word upon it.

Mr. BERRY. Well, those who had it in charge, and the Senator is a member of the committee. It was argued that the railroad company would build a very fine station, and in consideration of all that you gave them the land, and so forth and so on.

Now in regard to the grade crossings, I should like to ask the Senator if it is the duty of the Government to eliminate these grade crossings? Can not the Government make the railroad companies provide for that themselves? Why should we give them a million and a half dollars in that behalf?

Mr. GALLINGER. I suppose that the Government could prohibit any railroad corporation from coming into the District of Columbia at all.

Mr. BERRY. I think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not any doubt about it, and I have sometimes wondered if some Senators did not think that would be a good plan.

Mr. BERRY. I think the Government can impose such conditions as they see proper, can they not?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know whether the Government can compel the railroad corporations, with their present rights, to eliminate grade crossings or not. It certainly has been recognized by every progressive State in the American Union, certainly at the North, that it was a proper thing for States and municipalities to make contributions toward the elimination of grade crossings.

Mr. BERRY. Not paying the whole amount, but paying a certain portion of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what we are doing here.

Mr. BERRY. We are proposing to make a rather large contribution, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just as the Senator pleases.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him what is the amount raised per annum by taxation in the District of Columbia?

Mr. GALLINGER. About $4,000,000 at present; but I will say to the Senator on that matter of taxation—I shall be called to account by the Evening Star to-morrow, of course, for the statement I make—that in the District of Columbia practically no personal tax is paid. There is a law on the statute book, but it has been declared inoperative by the courts because the board of assessors was partially wiped out, and under the provisions of the organic act the citizens of the District of Columbia pay $1.50 on the hundred on real estate, which is valued at 65 per cent for the purposes of taxation.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I want to pursue the inquiry further. Does this bill make any provision for the issuance of bonds, or is the amount to be paid in cash by the District of Columbia from taxation?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there is no provision for the issuance of bonds.

Mr. BACON. That leads me to remark—I do not want to say anything about the general merits of the bill, because I am not familiar with it, and there are other Senators who are, but it does seem to me to be a very serious matter to lay upon the District of Columbia an assessment of $1,600,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is spread over five years.

Mr. BACON. Even if it is spread over five years. This is a very small community. We are so in the habit of appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars that it does not seem to amount to anything when considered in comparison with the great wealth of the whole country; but when you have a small community of some 300,000 people, it is an extremely serious matter to put upon them an assessment of one million six hundred-odd thousand dollars, where they are not in a position to say yea or nay; and, as the Senator from New Hampshire himself says, he does not know and has never been informed, and there has been no intimation given by any one of those who are to pay this tax, whether they desire this expenditure or not.

Now, Mr. President, it is true that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia give it as their judgment that this would be to the interest of the District of Columbia, and I have no doubt Senators when they vote for this bill will agree with the Commissioners that it is to the interest of the District of Columbia, but it is a very fundamental proposition that those who are to furnish the money ought to be those who are to judge, so far as the conditions will enable them to judge, or for us to be informed of their wishes and judgment as to whether or not it is to their interest.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me just one moment further, I will say we naturally, in providing for the embellishment and for the improvement of Washington, are guided by the scale which we think ought to obtain in the case of a great city, the capital of a great nation, and I quite agree with that. I am in favor of the embellishment of Washington, but I do think, in view of the fact that we legislate for a community that has no opportunity to take part in the deliberations which shall determine that legislation, we ought to be extremely careful about putting on them a very serious burden.

I once served on the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I know the care with which that committee acts. I do not wish in any manner to insinuate that there has been any lack of care in this instance; but there are things in this community that I do not think would be permitted to exist if the community had charge of its own expenditures and of its own public works. For instance, take the matter of the water furnished to this community.

I think that is very much more important to the community than the advantages it will have from a great palatial car shed, or depot, or station, or whatever it may be called. There is not a community that I know of in the United States of one-fourth the population of this city that has such a curse on it as this community now has in the way of water without any filtration. If we are going to deal with this and disburse a large amount of money, it seems to me we ought to find out before we put upon these people the assessment what is their wish in the matter.

We may not be able to find it out accurately, but we can find it out approximately; and for one I am prepared to say that if this improvement is one that is essential to the embellishment of Washington, but is entirely disproportionate to the expenditure which Washington would make outside of the fact that it is the capital, the burden should be borne by the people at large and not by the people of this little community. That is my judgment on that point.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator's statement is not such as I could reasonably take issue with on some points, but the Senator doubtless is aware of the fact that we are now engaged in the task of installing a magnificent filtration plant for the city of Washington and that in a little while we shall have better water in this city.

Mr. BACON. As to that, I think it is entirely proper that the burden of the appropriation should be put upon the community here largely, because it will be directly benefited. But these are different matters.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been in some cities of the American Union where I found the water a little nearer real estate than I have in the city of Washington. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I do not see how the Senator arrived at that conclusion. It seems to me that some process of filtration is badly needed here.

Mr. GALLINGER. But that is in process of correction and it will be corrected very soon. I say "very soon," for we do not count these matters by days, because it is a great scheme to install a slow sand filtration plant for any city. It may be a year, it may be two years before that plant is in full operation; but it is coming, and in every respect we have tried to meet the requirements of the city of Washington. Of course, we can not have a referendum on this matter.

Every appropriation that we make has the wise consideration of some committee of this body, and perhaps the wiser consideration of the body itself, and this follows along the line. We appropriate by direct means for everything that the city of Washington enjoys. We never have asked them yet to vote on the question, and of course we can not on this.

It will not, however, be a very great burden—$300,000 a year. This is a rich city, and, in my judgment, this added burden will be scarcely noticeable.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, it has been suggested to me by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that we never legislate on the smallest matters concerning the District of Columbia without consulting the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and under the law they must be citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BACON. They are not selected by the citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but they are citizens of the District, and they have not only the rights and duties of individual taxpayers and citizens, but they have official duties which they, I know, try to perform faithfully.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I would not be so importunate, but that I have an engagement and I want to make a short statement before I leave.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator for any statement.

Mr. PATTERSON. As the Senate is aware, I introduced an amendment for the purpose of opening the use of this union depot to all railroads. The committee took the case under consideration, and by the amendment which they have reported—which is not in the exact language of the amendment I offered—they accomplished precisely what I desired to accomplish, namely, that all railroads, whether those now in existence or those that may be constructed in the future, shall have the right of entry upon terms substantially like those which other railroads now have; and if the terminal road and the Pennsylvania Railroad may not be able to agree, then the supreme court of the District of Columbia will determine the terms. I am not a stickler for the language of the amendment, but since the amendment which has been offered accomplishes substantially what I desire, I am willing to accept the amendment of the committee as a substitute for mine.

I say this in view of the fact that some impression prevails that my amendment simply refers to the single road I mentioned when I offered the amendment. I want to remove that impression. The amendment reported by the committee is substantially that which I offered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that the committee amendment has been incorporated in the bill.

Mr. PATTERSON. I did not know that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Before the Senator proceeds, I desire to make a brief statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to make a brief statement myself, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Not until I have made a brief statement myself. It will only take a moment. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to the question which he raised a few moments ago in regard to the title of the railroads to the land heretofore granted or proposed to be granted.

I do not believe that anyone claims that those lands were actually granted to the railroad company. The companies were merely given a right of occupancy, a mere easement. They are there merely as tenants at will, undoubtedly, because in all the acts we have passed upon this subject we have always put in a separate section providing that "Congress may amend, alter, or repeal this act."

Now, then, if you have granted a piece of land, how could you repeal the act by which you made the grant? I think it is thoroughly understood that the land does not belong to the railroad company, but that the title is still in the Government, and that they are upon the land simply as tenants.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question there?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. If I understand the case, we gave them certain rights estimated at a million and a half dollars and agreed that we would permit them to go on and build a depot on this ground, and reserved the right to repeal that act. Now we are going to pay them a million and a half dollars in order to get them to go somewhere else.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is the proposition. In addition to that, in the act of 1901 we gave them additional land, and in the act which the Senator from New Hampshire is advocating here we do not require them to relinquish the right that we gave them to occupy Garfield Park, but they get a million and a half of money and Garfield Park in addition. I want to say to the Senate that this is a proposition that ought to be thoroughly examined, and this bill should be studied by individual Senators before they cast their votes for it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not gone into a discussion as to the ownership of the land occupied by this railroad corporation. They have now occupied it for thirty-one years, and have paid taxes on it. A year and a half ago we gave them a further grant of additional land to construct a new station on it, and we are not going to dispossess them. Every Senator knows that. But I am not going into that matter.

I had hoped to get a vote on this bill this evening, but the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] says he wishes to discuss it further, and very likely other Senators do. The Senator from North Dakota has kindly said to me that, unless some other Senators object—and I trust no other Senator will object—he is willing that a vote shall be taken on the bill immediately after the routine business on Thursday morning, and I make the request that that be done.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I make no objection to that because I want time to examine some of these matters and wish to debate the question still further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

BARK HOMEWARD BOUND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4902) to provide an American register for the bark Homeward Bound, which were, in line 4, to strike out "Homeward Bound," and insert "Otto Gildemeister;" in line 7, after "States," to insert "and give the said bark the name of Homeward Bound: Provided, however, That such register shall not entitle or authorize said bark to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States, nor shall said bark receive or be entitled to receive any subsidy, bounty, or aid of any kind that may hereafter be granted to American vessels; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to provide an American register for the bark Otto Gildemeister."

Mr. BARD. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON THE DISEASES OF THE HORSE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 92) providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of the Horse; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT ON THE DISEASES OF CATTLE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 91) providing for the publication of 50,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

FRANKS FOR SENDING OUT SEED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 82) providing for the printing annually of franks required for sending out seed; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. On Saturday last I gave notice that I would to-day call up the bill (H. R. 13359) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, but, at the request of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], who is waiting for an answer to a resolution of the Senate relative to some information which he desires in connection with the bill, I give notice that on Wednesday morning next, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of that appropriation bill.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am authorized by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the vote by which the amendments to the Army appropriation bill were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time and passed be reconsidered, solely for the purpose of proposing some slight amendments to the clause which authorizes the President to sell Army posts, restricting that right to three certain posts at Indianapolis, Columbus, and Buffalo, and authorizing him in those particular cases to use the money received in each of those places for purchasing other lands in the vicinity and constructing posts; and also an amendment which authorizes him in selling this property to subdivide it, as it is right in the midst of the cities named, and quite valuable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the votes by which the amendment of the Senate to the bill H. R. 12804, an act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, were ordered to be engrossed and the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed may be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move to amend the bill on page 24, line 22, before the word "military," by striking out the word "any" and inserting the word "the;" in the same line to change the word "post" to "posts" and the word "reservation" to "reservations," and after the word "reservations" to insert "at Indianapolis, Ind.; Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y." All these amendments are in the same line.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him, does this propose that any specific portion of the $4,000,000 appropriated shall be expended at those places?

Mr. PROCTOR. No; it has nothing to do with that. It only refers to the amounts realized from the sale of the existing posts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 22, before the word "military," it is proposed to strike out "any" and insert "the;" in the same line to change the word "post" to "posts" and "reservation" to "reservations," and after "reservations" to insert "at Indianapolis, Ind.; Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the language now be reported as it has been amended.

Mr. PROCTOR. There are other amendments, and the text can be read after they have been adopted.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. PROCTOR. In the same clause, on page 24, line 25, after the word "value," I move to insert "either as a whole or in subdivisions."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. On page 25, after the word "Treasury," I move to strike out the part in italics and insert what I send to the desk in lieu of the words to be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, after the word "Treasury," at the end of line 2, it is proposed to strike out:

And all such proceeds are hereby appropriated for the purchase of such other lands as may be required for military purposes or for building barracks and quarters on such other lands devoted to military purposes; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make such purchases.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And a sum of money not exceeding the proceeds of such sale or sales at each of such places, respectively, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of such lands at or in the vicinity of Indianapolis, Ind., Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., respectively, as may be required for military purposes, and for building barracks or quarters on such lands, to be devoted to military purposes, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make such purchases of lands for the establishment of military posts at such places, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire the language read as it has been amended?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clause will be read as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

And whenever in the opinion of the President the lands and improvements, or any portion of them, of the military posts or reservations at Indianapolis, Ind., Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., have become undesirable for military purposes he may, in his discretion, cause the same to be appraised and sold at public sale at not less than the appraised value, either as a whole or in subdivisions under such regulations as to public notice and terms and conditions of sale as he may prescribe, and the proceeds to be deposited in the Treasury; and a sum of money not exceeding the proceeds of such sale or sales at each of such places, respectively, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of such lands at or in the vicinity of Indianapolis, Ind., Columbus, Ohio, and Buffalo, N. Y., respectively, as may be required for military purposes, and for building barracks or quarters on such lands to be devoted to military purposes, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to make such purchases of lands for the establishment of military posts at such places, respectively.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 13, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 12, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia day. Has that committee anything to bring up?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider House bill 13405, now on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Before that is done, it will be necessary to refer the bill to the proper Calendar—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. So that transfer will be made.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he will not consent that this bill may go over until the next District day? I desire to say to him that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has taken a great interest in the measure, has given it some study, and has expected to be present at the time it was taken up. He is unavoidably absent at this time, and the gentleman knows how that absence has occurred. This matter has been for a month or more waiting until the gentleman from Wisconsin could be present, who has been unavoidably absent on account of sickness, and I ask unanimous consent that the measure go over until the next District day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this measure go over until the next regular District day. Is there objection?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; Mr. Speaker, I object. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in reference to that, I have been unavoidably absent from the House now three months; and, so far as I am personally concerned, I would be delighted to have the bill go over for two weeks or a month. But I have a duty to perform in the interest of the District, and the gentleman from Missouri will readily see that after an absence of three months, and now I am on the floor, that I would be failing here in my duty as chairman of the committee to consent to further delay in any District legislation.

Mr. COWHERD. I desire to say to the gentleman that there is nothing of a public nature which necessitates the present consideration of this bill. The officers of this company concede that they are in no hurry. The gentleman from Illinois was present all the time when the gentleman from Wisconsin was absent, ready to consider it when it was taken up, but he is unavoidably absent, and I know that he wanted to be heard in this discussion.

Mr. BABCOCK. He will very likely have an opportunity before it is passed.

Mr. COWHERD. No; he is not in the city.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union report the bill and pending amendments to the House.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion, the gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that at 3 o'clock the committee rise and report the bill to the House, the previous question being ordered on the bill and amendments to passage. Is there objection?

Mr. COWHERD. I object.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I object.

Mr. COWHERD. I will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I have no intention to delay the passage of the bill if we can have sufficient time for its consideration.

Mr. BABCOCK. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. COWHERD. We want to have two hours for general debate on our side, and then that the bill be read under the five-minute rule for amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman consent to 4 o'clock?

Mr. COWHERD. For general debate to close then?

Mr. BABCOCK. For the committee to rise at 4 o'clock.

Mr. COWHERD. I will not, if you give two hours in opposition to the bill, and then the bill be read under the five-minute rule. I have nothing to say as to how much time the gentleman would desire.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask for my original motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the original motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN GASLIGHT COMPANIES.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HASKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13405, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13405) authorizing the Washington Gaslight Company to purchase the Georgetown Gaslight Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the object of this bill is twofold. It reduces the price of gas in Georgetown from $1.25 a thousand to $1 per thousand. It authorizes the Washington Gaslight Company, or the company operating here in the main city, to buy the property and franchises of the Georgetown company. It further authorizes the Washington company to increase its capital stock from $2,600,000 to the market value of the stock of the properties of both companies. The stock of the Washington Gaslight Company is now $2,600,000 and of the Georgetown company $150,000.

The provision in the bill limits it to the actual value of the stock. That is, this bill now before the committee. This, I believe, is all that this bill proposes to do, Mr. Chairman. While I reported this bill, I have been absent from the House, as most of the members know, on account of illness, and my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] has kindly consented to take my place to-day on the floor. I now yield to him the balance of my time.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to occupy any time just now.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think, Mr. Chairman, there is very little more to be said on this side of the House, and if gentlemen want to say anything in opposition they can do so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What method does this bill provide for the ascertainment of the value of the respective plants for capitalization?

Mr. BABCOCK. It limits the capitalization to the market value of the stock for a period of three months.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The average market value of the stock for a period of three months?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Has the stock of these companies a quotation value?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; here in Washington; I do not think anywhere else.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Are the values quoted on any stock exchange in the country?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; on the Washington Stock Exchange.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the bill provide for including in the value the plant and franchises, aside from the value of the stock?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that the bill provides this method for fixing the value of the property. Now, I understand that before this bill is reported to the House another proposition will be made which authorizes the supreme court to fix the value of the property.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That will come up in the form of an amendment?

Mr. BABCOCK. I understand it is to be offered.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin have any objection to that method of ascertainment of value?

Mr. BABCOCK. I have no objection to any fair method whatever.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask these questions, for I have not read the bill. I have no objection to the consolidation, providing adequate safeguards are placed in the bill for the protection of the public.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say that the committee will accept any amendment that authorizes the company to issue their stock on a fair cash basis of the actual value of the property.

Mr. COWHERD. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that no one is objecting to the consolidation.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question.

Mr. BABCOCK. Very well.

Mr. PAYNE. I notice the provision for ascertaining the market value is this:

Provided, Such actual value to be determined by the average market price thereof during the period of three months next preceding the special meeting prescribed by this section, which said special meeting shall take place not later than three months after the passage of this act.

Does that give the owners and promoters of these gaslight companies an opportunity to force up the stock of the company, if they desire, in order to get the new consolidation?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not see that it does. If the gentleman owned the stock he would have no reason for doing it, would he?

Mr. PAYNE. If I wanted to water the stock I think I could get the price up to the amount of the water I desire to put into it in three months.

Mr. BABCOCK. The business of the company, as I understand it, has been perfectly legitimate for fifty years. If the gentleman prefers an amendment that it shall be ascertained by the value of the stock for three months prior to the passage of the bill, that will be perfectly acceptable.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it true that the market value of this stock is now about four times its par value?

Mr. BABCOCK. I believe it is.

Mr. PAYNE. So, if this bill passes, on the present market value they would get four shares for one?

Mr. BABCOCK. The shares at present are $20 par value.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I think if I owned the stock I would be willing to take it on that basis without three months' speculation in advance.

Mr. RAY of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] a question or two, if he pleases.

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. RAY of New York. The present value of this stock is based largely upon the earnings of the company, is it not?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly. I take it for granted that it is based upon the value of the property.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, the company is now paying such dividends to stockholders that the value of the stock has gone away up to about five times its par value.

Mr. BABCOCK. It would not be worth that much to me; I do not think it would to the gentleman from New York. They pay 10 per cent——

Mr. RAY of New York. Is it not the fact that to-day the charge of this company for gas is largely in excess of what it ought to be?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir; I do not think so. I do not believe that is conceded.

Mr. RAY of New York. Is not that the general complaint?

Mr. BABCOCK. I have not heard any such complaint. More than that, this is the fact—that the people in Washington have the best gas that is furnished on the Atlantic coast. There is no other Eastern city that has the quality of gas that we have.

Mr. RAY of New York. I am not now speaking of the quality of the gas; I am speaking of the price charged. Your bill, if I understand—and if I am wrong I am perfectly willing to be corrected—proposes—if I have read aright the bill and the report—to permit this consolidated company to issue about five shares of stock in place of one of the present shares.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is right.

Mr. RAY of New York. In other words, they are going to say to a man: "Because your shares of stock are worth $500 each, you may have five where you now have one." You are going to put the stock on the market at that rate, if this bill passes, without adding a cent's worth of real estate or personal property of any kind to the actual holdings of this company. Is not that the sum and substance of the proposition?

Mr. BABCOCK. The sum and substance——

Mr. RAY of New York. Is my statement wrong?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; it is wrong.

Mr. RAY of New York. Wherein?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is wrong in this: This company was established in 1848. Since that time it has earned money and accumulated money that has never been represented in stock. To-day its stock amounts to only $2,600,000. I ask the gentleman to compare these figures with corresponding stock in his own State and in the cities of his own State, and the capitalization of the stock of companies there.

This has been a legitimately conducted business corporation from the time that it was organized, and the price of gas here in the city of Washington has gone down from $3.50 per thousand to $1 per thousand.

Mr. RAY of New York. The gentleman states that this company has been earning and accumulating money; now, has it that money on hand?

Mr. BABCOCK. No; it has been invested in their plant here in Washington, in different buildings, in extending their mains through the streets, in real estate, in everything that goes to make the property necessary to conduct the business of the company.

Mr. RAY of New York. You claim, then, that out of their profits they have been purchasing real estate and personal property and extending their plant until now the plant is worth, at the market valuation, five times what it was; that instead of taking these earnings or these profits and dividing them among the stockholders, they have been putting them into this property. Is that what you say?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes, sir; they have.

Mr. RAY of New York. But the report does not show that; it shows the contrary.

Mr. BABCOCK. Does the gentleman say the report shows that the company has not invested their money in plants and buildings, etc.?

Mr. RAY of New York. As I understand, the report shows that the increased value of this stock arises simply from the earnings or profits of the company, which is due to the extravagant prices they charge consumers for gas. Now, if they would reduce their charges to the consumer for gas to a reasonable sum, they would not have these enormous profits, and their stock would be worth probably no more than par. That is about all there is of it, as I understand this bill. As I read the bill, you are simply proposing now to create a gas monopoly here in the city of Washington and to water the present stock in the ratio of about five to one, without the company adding a single penny of property of any description to the plant. So you would perpetuate the present price of gas regardless of its cost. In other words, we are to say by law that a dollar's worth of stock is worth $5, and that it may be so sold; we are going to multiply the value of the holdings of each man by five, and do it by law.

A MEMBER. By five.

Mr. RAY of New York. And so approve and perpetuate the present extravagant charges for gas in the District of Columbia and in the city of Washington. So we create and perpetuate a gas monopoly or trust in this District.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman state to the House where gas is sold cheaper, of this quality?

Mr. HILL. Or any other quality.

Mr. COWHERD. I can furnish the figures to the gentleman, if he wants them.

Mr. RAY of New York. I prefer that the gentleman from Missouri should state that; he has studied those figures.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask the gentleman from New York. He made the statement it was an extravagant price, and I ask where, especially in the Eastern States, with which he is familiar, gas of the same quality is sold for less money?

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] says he can give those figures. I have not studied them.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman will undoubtedly do that in his speech.

Mr. RAY of New York. I have heard the charges of extravagant prices made, outrageous prices, and one thing I do know, because I read by the gaslight in the District of Columbia, and that is that the quality of gas here is not any better than it is in the town where I live, and it is not any better than it is in many cities that I have visited.

Mr. HILL. I would ask the gentleman from New York what he pays for gas in the town where he lives?

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, I would not want to state just now; but there can be no comparison, because mine is a small town and conditions are not similar.

Mr. HILL. Not less than $2, is it?

Mr. RAY of New York. Perhaps not.

Mr. PAYNE. Probably not, but there are only 6,000 people there.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; that is different.

Mr. PAYNE. Two dollars there would be worth about 75 cents in the city of Washington.

Mr. RAY of New York. I was simply asking the question for information at this time, and in saying what I have I stated it because I so understand. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman explain or answer, as he sees fit; I do not want to misrepresent anything.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. STEWART] desires to be heard. If the gentleman may be recognized in his own time very well, or I will yield him from mine, but I prefer that he be recognized in his own time and that I may be recognized in mine.

Mr. STEWART of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. I wish it distinctly understood that I am not opposed to the Washington Gaslight Company buying the stock of the Georgetown Gaslight Company and combining the two under one head and establishing a uniform price for gas in the District of Columbia. This is a good portion of the bill and should pass, and it shows the wisdom of the gaslight company in adopting it, for they hope to carry through the bad portion of the bill, which is section 4. I am opposed to the passage of this bill for several reasons.

In the first place, I am opposed to its passage, because the Washington Gaslight Company can not show much over one-third the amount of physical property for which they ask Congress to allow them to capitalize; second, if they are allowed to overcapitalize their property they will not be able to pay sufficient dividends to their stockholders and at the same time maintain their works to proper efficiency to serve the public; third, it precludes any reduction in the price of gas; fourth, it throws watered stock on the market which will ultimately fall into the hands of innocent purchasers; fifth, because Congress ought not to lend itself to any corporation or any scheme that will defraud the District of Columbia or the Government of the United States. I sat in the District Committee, to which this bill was referred, for two months, and no man ever appeared to advocate it or give any reason why the capital stock of this corporation should have its par value increased five times. The committee never had a hearing. They never considered the bill in committee to exceed forty-five minutes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman permit a question at this time? I would like to know if the gentleman himself is engaged in the manufacture of gas.

Mr. STEWART of New York. I have a thousand dollars of stock in one gas company.

Mr. BABCOCK. What price do you receive for the gas?

Mr. STEWART of New York. One dollar and twenty-five cents per thousand.

Mr. BABCOCK. What is the candlepower?

Mr. STEWART of New York. Eighteen to twenty candlepower.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is an instance of gas of 18-candlepower at $1.25 per thousand, while here it has a candlepower of 25.

Mr. STEWART of New York. That has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. How large a town is your gaslight company situated in?

Mr. STEWART of New York. A town of about 25,000 inhabitants.

Mr. PAYNE. What is the output?

Mr. STEWART of New York. About 34,000,000 feet.

Mr. PAYNE. What is the output of the Washington Gaslight Company?

Mr. STEWART of New York. One billion three hundred million feet.

Mr. PAYNE. Why, they are not parallel cases at all.

Mr. STEWART of New York. They are not parallel cases; $1.25 in Amsterdam is much cheaper than a dollar is here, and the 18-candlepower can be produced for 14 cents less than the 25-candlepower. Twenty-five-candlepower in this city costs 60 cents, and this is the best gas that is made anywhere. Nobody is talking about the quality of the gas here; it is the very best, and it costs more money on that account.

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask a question right there on the point that the gentleman has just spoken of. I understand the gentleman to say that he is in favor of this bill up to section 4.

Mr. STEWART of New York. I am in favor of the section which permits them to combine the two companies and establish one price—a uniform price—for gas.

Mr. HILL. But you are opposed to section 4 on account of the increased valuation.

Mr. STEWART of New York. Yes.

Mr. HILL. You certainly must be aware of the fact that precisely the same language is used in regard to the Georgetown Gaslight Company in the purchase and sale as is used in section 4 in fixing the value of the stock.

Mr. STEWART of New York. It increases the stock about five times.

Mr. HILL. If you object to the increased valuation of the stock of the Washington Gaslight Company, why do you not object to the increased valuation of the stock of the Georgetown Gaslight Company in making the sale and purchase?

Mr. STEWART of New York. I do.

Mr. HILL. You say you do not.

Mr. STEWART of New York. I object to both.

Mr. HILL. You say you are in favor of everything in section 4?

Mr. STEWART of New York. I do not say anything of the kind. I object to their increasing their stock five times.

Mr. HILL. I understood you to say so.

Mr. STEWART of New York. No, sir; I did not say anything of the kind. I said I was in favor of section 1 of the bill, and said it was the good section of the bill, and that they hoped to carry through section 4, which is the bad section of the bill. It is an infamous section. Now, if I will not be interrupted for a few minutes, I will continue my argument.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. STEWART of New York. I do.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The chairman of the committee [Mr. BABCOCK] has suggested the price of gas in Amsterdam, N. Y., which, I believe, is your home city?

Mr. STEWART of New York. Yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Who fixes the price of gas at Amsterdam?

Mr. STEWART of New York. The company.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. The company does?

Mr. STEWART of New York. Yes.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. But the ordinance under which you are operating there must fix a maximum price?

Mr. STEWART of New York. No; I think not.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. No maximum?

Mr. STEWART of New York. No maximum.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Then you have the right to ask whatever the public will pay?

Mr. STEWART of New York. We have the right to ask whatever the public will pay in that city. The committee never had a hearing; they never considered this bill to exceed forty-five minutes. I think the House ought at least to listen to the arguments here, because the bill was never considered sufficiently in the committee, and let the House decide according to the merits of the bill. No one has ever given a reason why the Washington Gaslight Company should increase its capital stock from $2,000,000 to $13,000,000, and the Georgetown Company its stock from $150,000 to $750,000; the combined capital of $2,750,000 increased to $13,750,000. With this enormous amount of money involved, it seemed very strange that some one did not appear to represent the company before the committee.

Another thing that seemed to strike me very strangely is this: The District Commissioners reported favorably upon the bill, but I fail to see that they have touched upon this overcapitalization question at all. I have also read the city solicitor's report, which the majority of the committee have attached and incorporated in their report. He has gone into the merits of the bill with considerable detail, and, while he mentions sections 1, 2, 3, and 5, he skips section 4, which, to my mind, is the important section of the bill, which increases the capital stock of this corporation and votes millions of dollars to its stockholders. So when I was asked to sign the report I said I had not the necessary information and could not sign it. I then began to look about for some information, so that I might sign the majority report, if possible, or, at least, the minority report intelligently.

I began to look up the history of the company and found the Washington Gaslight Company was organized in 1848 with a capital stock of $50,000 and a rebate given the subscribers of $7,500, which shows that there was only originally put into this company $42,500. There is no record which shows that there was ever any more money put into this company. The capital stock was increased from time to time by the earnings of the company until it reached $2,600,000. It has had a most marvelous record. For the first thirty-one and a half years they declared 16.8 per cent yearly dividends and also issued $600,000 of certificates of indebtedness which were distributed to the stockholders, and this also represented earnings or dividends.

The company in 1866 had its books destroyed by a resolution of the board of directors by sending them to a paper mill in Philadelphia and ground into pulp, and the only reason they gave for this extraordinary procedure was that they had been improperly or carelessly kept and some of them were moldy. This was a very strange proceeding for any company to follow. I simply give this little bit of history to show the shrewdness, the cunning, and the character of the original directors of this company, and when the present direction asked Congress to allow them to increase the par value of their stock five times I was suspicious and concluded they were worthy followers of their predecessors.

They have for years been declaring 10 per cent dividends, besides extending their lines and improving their works to the extent of about $15,000 a year. This marvelous record they wish now to round out by modestly asking Congress to allow them to increase their capital stock five times, which will enrich them millions of dollars.

While I was still looking for information, the Washington Gaslight people waited upon me by one of their managers or directors, and, after some considerable talk, he gave me a verbal statement of their physical properties, which is so necessary to establish the capitalization of a corporation. He stated they had over 30,000 consumers and over 50,000 meters, and his valuation of same was $500,000. This is about $125,000 high. They claim to have 500 miles of mains in the city of Washington. I learn they have only 327 miles. I found, by reading the Spooner report in 1896, out of 18 cities in the United States (including the city of Boston, where it costs over $15,000 a mile to lay) the average cost of gas mains per mile is between $3,000 and $4,000. Allowing the Washington Gaslight Company the benefit of the largest average cost of $4,000 a mile, and allowing they have 500 miles of mains, they would then have $2,000,000 in gas mains; but if they only have 327 miles, and that is all they have, and the average cost is $4,000 a mile, then they only have $1,408,000 in mains.

He also claimed that they have gasometers and the plant and machinery for manufacturing gas and that these are worth $2,000,000. He also claimed that they had some real estate in the city here and some money in bank, but he did not say how much. According to his estimate, all told, they have $8,000,000 invested. According to the best figures which I have been able to make they have $4,400,000. According to Edward Bemis, who is a very good writer on gas, the plants in all cities of over 200,000 inhabitants east of the Rocky Mountains can be duplicated for $4 per thousand feet annual output, which, taking the two companies combined, the Washington company having an output of 1,300,000,000 feet and the Georgetown Gaslight Company having an output of 50,000,000 feet, that makes 1,350,000,000 feet, and the plant of these companies can be duplicated for $5,400,000.

If the works are all in first-class order, then we have something like $5,400,000 worth of property in order to establish their valuation, but it is questionable about the works being modern in every particular. I understand their water-gas plant is in first-class order and of the latest improvement, and I learn their coal-gas plant is somewhat antiquated and should have some money spent upon it, so that it is questionable whether they have $5,400,000 on which to establish their valuation. If they have only $5,400,000 worth of physical properties, what are they going to do with the difference between that and the $13,750,000? According to the bill, this will be distributed to the stockholders.

What is this $8,350,000? The advocates of this bill will tell you it is franchise; that the Government gave them this franchise and that they have the right to sell it. I hold it is nothing but water, and they have not the right to sell it. The Government never gave them an unlimited, irrevocable franchise. You will find on the bottom of the law which was enacted for them in 1848, and under which they are working, that there is this clause: "That Congress reserves the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act." Thus you will see that at that time Congress had in mind the importance of holding a check on the price of gas. This franchise differs from the ordinary franchise granted by the States in the fact that it contains this clause: "That Congress reserves the power to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The reason the Washington Gaslight Company are so anxious to capitalize at this great amount of money is in order to make a stock-jobbing concern of it; in order that they may sell this $8,350,000 worth of water to the "dear people." They want to get all the lambs in. Then they will shear them of their fleece; they will stop paying dividends after a few years and the stock will go down. Then these shrewd financiers will buy in the stock at a low price. It is not good policy for Congress to allow these people to capitalize a franchise. It has never been the policy of Congress to do so. All the past Congresses have followed the policy of being very liberal with this company by permitting them to get a good price for gas, for the reason they preferred to allow the company to make a good dividend to its stockholders and also to improve its works and make its extensions out of the earnings, in order that they should not bond the company and thereby lessen its efficiency as a public servant.

There is another class of men who say we do not care what the physical properties of a company are, but what is it worth? What is the stock selling for in the market? A thing is worth what it will bring. Very well, we will take it on that basis. I have a calculation here which shows the average asking price for five years on the Washington Stock Exchange which the Washington Gaslight Company have held their stock at, which is $53.63 a share. Now, on 130,000 shares at $53.63 they would have a capital of $6,972,030. The average price for the Georgetown Gaslight Company for the last five years has been $55 per share, and they have 6,000 shares, which amounts to $330,000. The combined capital of the two on this plan would be $7,302,030. But some of the advocates of the bill will say you ought to capitalize it on its present value, and it is quoted to-day at $81 a share.

This, I say, is wrong, and ought not to be done, for the reason that this stock has advanced very rapidly since the proposed legislation was introduced two years ago. It was selling in the market during the year 1900 at about from $52 to $53 a share. In December, when there was a bill introduced into the House to allow them to increase their capital stock, immediately this stock advanced to $62, and in January, 1901, when the bill was introduced, January 8, the stock advanced to $65; but this bill was recommitted to the committee, and the stock went down to $58 or $60 almost immediately. In December, 1901, at which time Congress convened again, the stock jumped up to $67 a share, and in January, 1902, it advanced to $71.25, and in February, when it looked as if the bill would be favorably reported, it advanced to $84, and in April, when the majority of the committee signed this report, it touched $87.25 a share.

So you will see this proposed legislation will allow these stock gamblers to manipulate this stock at any figure from $50 to $87.25 a share, and it would be unfair to allow them to capitalize on to-day's market or on the market at which the bill allows them to capitalize—page 5, line 4—"if the average market price thereof, during the period of three months next preceding the special meeting prescribed by this section." You can see that if they have three months in which to manipulate this stock they can run it up to any price they see fit. So the only eminently fair way to capitalize it on the market price is to take the normal market price for the last five years, which is $53.63 a share. This plan will only allow them a capitalization of $7,302,030.

Let us look at it from another standpoint, the standpoint of the investor or a speculator, who says he does not care what the physical properties are, but how much interest will it pay? The Washington Gaslight Company to-day pays 10 per cent on its $2,600,000, and it also increases its plant by the extension of mains to the tune of about $100,000 a year. But how much will it pay on a capitalization of $13,750,000? The only way to arrive at that is to know what it costs to make gas.

I have made some investigation, and whereas it may not be within a few cents of its cost it is very nearly correct. One of the directors claimed to me it cost them 60 cents a thousand cubic feet to make it. I also asked a New York gas expert what it would cost to make gas in Washington, and he said he thought 60 cents for the quality of gas made in Washington was a fair price. This will leave the company a net profit of 40 cents a thousand feet. The Washington Gaslight Company sells 1,300,000,000 cubic feet of gas a year and the Georgetown company 50,000,000, making a total amount of 1,350,000,000.

At 40 cents a thousand feet this would give them a net profit of $540,000. What percentage is $540,000 on $13,750,000? It is just 3.92 per cent. This is enough interest in a perfectly safe security like Government bonds, or in a municipal bond or bond and mortgage, but it is not enough interest in a hazardous business like the manufacture of gas, when the plant deteriorates or the franchise is subject to legislation. Now, if they declare only 3.92 per cent and have nothing left to replace their plant, you can see that when the plant has to be replaced the stockholders will have to be assessed or the company will have to be bonded or the dividends stopped, so that 3.92 per cent is not a fair return on the investors' money of $13,750,000, and no provision made for maintaining the efficiency of the plant.

You can look at it from any standpoint, and this House ought not to allow them to capitalize either on their physical properties, of which they have only about $5,400,000, or upon the market value of the stock at which it has been selling at an average price during the past five years, and they will only have on this plan a capital of $7,302,000, or the amount which one of their directors told me they had invested—$8,000,000—or on a dividend-paying basis of only 3.92, and nothing laid up to keep the plant in repair. This House should allow them to capitalize for $13,750,000.

Then what is the real object of the bill? It is for the Washington Gaslight Company to water its stock between eight and nine millions of dollars; and, what is worse, it will preclude any reduction in the price of gas in this city or the District of Columbia for a generation or more. No matter what evolutions may occur in the making of gas, no matter what science may discover, no matter what other cities may be paying for gas, the people of Washington will continue to pay a high price for gas in order to pay the interest on an overcapitalized company. The people will appeal to Congress for help, but the pleadings will fall on deaf ears, for the stockholders of the Washington Gaslight Company will also appeal to Congress and show that they are only getting a small interest on their capital in a hazardous business, and urge it would be equal to confiscation of their property and unjust to them to reduce the price of gas and thereby reduce their income. They will urge that Congress on the 12th day of May, 1902, investigated the standing of this company and found it to be worth $13,750,000 and authorized the increase of stock to that amount, and they bought their stock on that information in good faith.

Is anyone simple enough to believe that the price of gas will ever be lower than it is to-day in the city of Washington if this bill passes Congress?

The Washington Gaslight Company claims to have the right to increase its stock without coming to Congress. If they have authority under existing law to increase their capital stock, as provided by section 4 of the bill reported by the majority of the committee, we have no contentions to their increasing their capital under that law. In fact, we are not concerned in that. But they have come to Congress to have us authorize this increase. If this company was located in any other city of the United States and was a private corporation and they felt like overcapitalizing their company, we should have nothing to say about it. But this is a different case. We are the representatives of the people of the District of Columbia. They have no other representatives, and it is our duty to look after their interests.

The Government is a large consumer of gas, having in past years consumed one-fourth of all the gas made by the Washington Gaslight Company, and last year they consumed one-sixth of all the gas made by this company. It is our plain duty, then, to prevent a heavy burden being placed on this District and upon the Government for years to come. We are in the Federal Congress of the United States. The Washington Gaslight Company asks us to set our stamp of approval upon trusts, upon overcapitalizing this corporation, in a time when the people throughout the country are condemning just such things. Business men and bankers are watching this overcapitalization of corporations closely, and many men predict that the next panic will be brought about through this very source. It seems to me this company has marvelous impudence to ask Congress to set its stamp of approval upon the overcapitalization of this corporation. As an individual and as a member of this House, I wish to say I disapprove of overcapitalizing corporations or throwing watered stock on the market to be sold to innocent parties, and to have such action come from the Federal Congress of the United States seems the most vicious kind of legislation. I hope, Mr. Chairman, this bill will not pass.

I hope this bill will not be amended in any way. If the Washington Gaslight Company wishes to increase their capital stock let them come before Congress in a business way; let them bring us an inventory of all their physical properties and show to us what they are worth after fifty-four years of doing business and what the good will of this company is worth, and I have no doubt, if they can make a showing which will entitle them to more capitalization than they now have, Congress will be glad to grant them their request.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, there is to be an amendment introduced here by a distinguished member of this House, authorizing the supreme court of the District of Columbia to select three disinterested men whose duty it shall be to take evidence and establish the price at which they will allow the Washington Gaslight Company to capitalize. Mr. Chairman, this is worse than the bill itself. I am opposed to delegating the powers of Congress to any three men in the United States. For when millions of dollars go to work, they work mighty hard and fast; when millions of dollars are at stake, the consciences of men are sometimes elastic; when millions of dollars are involved, the judgment of men is sometimes warped. I hope, Mr. Chairman, this amendment will not pass, and for the honor of this House this bill will be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question. When he spoke about the powerful influence of money, was he speaking from his own experience?

Mr. STEWART of New York. I do not wish to cast any reflection upon any member of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. COWHERD obtained the floor.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question? Does the Government pay a dollar a thousand for the gas that is furnished to it, amounting, perhaps, to one-fourth of the whole consumption.

Mr. STEWART of New York. I can not tell.

Mr. SIMS. It does.

Mr. PAYNE. Then the Government pays the same price as individuals. Now, if the price of gas were put down to 80 cents a thousand, according to the gentleman's figures—and I think the cost of gas here is estimated exceedingly high; 50 cents per thousand would, perhaps, be a reasonable estimate, as I understand that coal can be obtained here at $3.50 a ton—assuming the cost of the gas at 60 cents a thousand, it could be sold at 80 cents a thousand, leaving 20 cents a thousand profit, which would be about $270,000, according to the gentleman's figures——

Mr. STEWART of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAYNE. Which would be $10,000 more than the 10 per cent dividends that the company is now paying on its capital stock. Would the gentleman favor having the bill amended so as to cut down the price of gas to 80 cents a thousand?

Mr. STEWART of New York. Well, I am not here to fight the gas company as to the prices they get. As a member of the committee, I felt it my duty to prevent their putting this bill through, because I think it is a bad bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Do you not think the proposition I have stated would be a reasonable business proposition?

Mr. STEWART of New York. I think the time will come when the price of gas will be much less than it is to-day. In view of the inventions of science, the evolutions of manufacture, the great gas and oil wells in Texas, etc., I believe the time is not far distant when gas will be worth less money than at present. When that time comes, I am willing to see the price reduced.

Mr. PAYNE. The price of manufacturing gas has been reduced lately by saving the by-products.

Mr. STEWART of New York. Oh, yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Most of the by-products now are made to pay an income to the company.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is not a new fact; that is old.

Mr. PAYNE. What does the gentleman from Ohio state?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I say that the sale of the by-products is not new. It has been going on for twenty-five years. For instance, twenty-five years ago these companies sold the coal tar.

Mr. PAYNE. Coal tar brought nothing in the market in former years, because there was no use for it. Very often it was taken out and burned, so as to get rid of it. It is only within a few years that this by-product has begun to assume any large value, so that its sale enabled the company to save money. The use of ammonia, another by-product, on a large scale has grown up in the last five or ten years, so that the gentleman's period of "twenty-five years" dwindles down somewhat.

Mr. HILL. May I ask what is the price of gas in New York City?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know.

Mr. STEWART of New York. One dollar a thousand, I understand.

Mr. COWHERD. I can give the figures. The price of gas in the city of New York is a little over 90 cents a thousand—90½ cents.

Mr. HILL. Ought not the price to be a good deal more in the city of Washington, considering the larger cost of the material?

Mr. COWHERD. Oh, no.

Mr. HILL. Why not?

Mr. COWHERD. In New York there are three or four companies furnishing gas——

Mr. HILL. That is all the more reason why the cost should be higher here.

Mr. GROSVENOR. As throwing some light on this controversy, I would like to be allowed——

Mr. COWHERD. Was I not recognized?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will not the gentleman from Missouri allow me to read a short table, which I think may afford a basis upon which this argument can proceed? The reading will take only a minute or two.

Mr. COWHERD. Of course I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have here a statement, said to be truly furnished from the figures of the census report up to date, which shows the population of different cities, the capitalization of the gas companies, their output, the net price of gas, and the candlepower of the gas.

Let me read:

	Population.	Capitalization.	Output, cubic feet.	Net price.	Candlepower.
San Francisco, Cal...	342,000	$13,623,000	900,000,000	$1.40	23

Mr. PAYNE (interrupting). Does that statement give the price of coal in the various cities?

Mr. GROSVENOR. The price of coal in Washington is far higher than in most of the cities I will name.

Mr. PAYNE. How is it in San Francisco?

Mr. GROSVENOR. In San Francisco, I presume, they do not make their gas out of coal, though I do not know. This statement continues:

Wilmington, Del.....	76,000	600,000	230,000,000	1.00	20
Georgetown, D. C....	15,000	150,000	50,000,000	1.25	25
Atlanta, Ga	100,000	2,764,000	800,000,000	1.00	21
Chicago, Ill.....	2,000,000	64,496,000	7,400,000,000	1.00	25

Mr. MANN. But let me say to the gentleman that in Chicago the gas companies furnish, in addition, all the street lighting to the city free.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That may be.

Mr. COWHERD. And about forty million of that sixty-four million is water.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will continue:

St. Louis, Mo.....	575,000	$21,000,000	1,200,000,000	$1.00	22
Indianapolis, Ind.....	200,000	2,750,000	280,000,000	1.00	18
Louisville, Ky.....	205,000	4,100,000	320,000,000	1.20	18
Baltimore, Md	509,000	17,850,000	1,673,000,000	1.10	24
Kansas City, Mo.....	180,000	8,800,000	800,000,000	1.00	24
Boston, Mass	.....	34,000,000	3,600,000,000	*1.00	18
Jersey City, N. J.....	365,000	21,000,000	975,000,000	1.10	25
Buffalo, N. Y	353,000	14,900,000	578,000,000	1.00	19

*Average.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Just one word more. Cincinnati has gas at 15 candlepower.

Now, I want simply to make a statement that the difference between the cost of gas at 18 candlepower and 25 is marked in the expenditure of this company last year when they paid $275,000 for the single item of naphtha as an ingredient to make up the difference between 15 and 25.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman kindly state where he obtained those figures?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did state that. Does the gentleman dispute any of them?

Mr. RAY of New York. I did not understand.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman dispute any of them?

Mr. RAY of New York. That is not answering my question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I asked the gentleman a question. I stated I got them from the census report—the last census report. Does the gentleman dispute any of them? Does the gentleman deny them?

Mr. RAY of New York. My question was as to the source from which those figures came. I was seeking information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I stated that is the best source I could get them from.

Mr. RAY of New York. I did not rise to dispute or enter into any argument, but wanted merely to get the source of the figures.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, before I have concluded my remarks I want to give what seems to me would be a fair price of gas in the District of Columbia, and I hope to devote some attention to the figures that have just been read by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], but at the outset I want to call the attention of this committee to the bill that is now before it. It is called a bill to consolidate or authorize the Washington Gaslight Company to purchase the Georgetown Gaslight Company, and there is added after it four significant words, "and for other purposes." I want to call the attention of the committee to the "other" purposes.

Let me say here that there is no man on the committee, and so far as I know no man in the House, that objects to the purchase of the Georgetown Gaslight Company by the Washington Gaslight Company, and yet man after man has come to me and said, "Why do you object to this consolidation? It would be better for the people; they would get the gas for a dollar in Georgetown." Let it be distinctly understood that we are in favor of the consolidation, but there is one feature of the consolidation that I would like to call the attention of the House to. We are told that the Washington Gaslight Company, or the stockholders of it, own the stock of the Georgetown Gaslight Company.

Now, this bill provides that in the purchase the Washington company may issue enough stock to buy the stock of the Georgetown company, and at what price? At whatever the Washington Gaslight Company chooses to fix for the stock they are going to buy from themselves. In other words, if you should strike out section 4 that waters the stock about $10,000,000, they would still have the opportunity to come in under section 1 and by buying the property that is worth probably $250,000 from themselves at a cost of $10,000,000, still water the stock to the same amount.

For that reason I think my friend from New York [Mr. STEWART] was misunderstood when the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] insisted that he had agreed entirely to section 1. As I understood him, he agreed to the consolidation; but he does not favor any watering of stock, whether it is in that section or in any other. Now, let me call your attention to section 4 of this bill.

Section 4 of the bill provides for the reissuing of the stock of the Washington Gaslight Company, and it provides that it is to be increased to the market value of the stock. How is that to be determined? By the average market price thereof during a period of three months. What three months? The last three months of this year, or last year, or any other time that is passed? Oh, no. During a period of three months next preceding the special election they are going to call of the stockholders to authorize the issue.

What will be the market value of that stock as fixed on the market as the bill provides? Why, there is none of that stock on the market, except what they choose to throw upon it, and that is very little. It is an air-tight corporation. What will be the value of it when you have said in this bill that they may issue a $100 share for a $20 share? Does anybody think it will be less than a hundred dollars?

Gentlemen, I want to say to you from the first day of the history of this company down to this hour there never was a Congressional investigation of this company that did not find them with $250,000 up to $700,000 of surplus, undivided dividends that they had been unable to dispose of. How much they have got to-day no man knows, because not one single, solitary witness appeared before the District of Columbia Committee in the two years this bill has been pending there in one form or another, neither in the last session nor in this, and I say that under this bill, if it becomes a law, the stock of this company will not go to 100, but more probably to 120 or 125.

Now, just a word as to the general proposition. Gentlemen come to me from all sides and say, "Well, if the stock is worth $100, why not permit them to issue $100 worth of stock? How is it different from any other business?" It is different in this way, that this company can only do business because you give it the right to use the property of the people on which to transact its business. This company is a monopoly, and ought to be a monopoly. I do not want any competing companies. This company is a monopoly, and the price at which it sells its product is fixed by law.

Now, when you go to capitalizing its earning capacity, it means nothing else than that you capitalize the price that you fix. What is your duty in regard to that? Every man knows it. You ought to permit this company to earn a fair profit upon the money invested, and in addition you ought to permit this company to earn an amount sufficient to take care of all depreciation of property, to earn enough to pay all expenses, and when it earns any more you have done something that is wrong—that ought not to be permitted. When you say you are going to let them issue $14,000,000 of stock because they can earn a profit on $14,000,000 as at present constituted, it simply means you are going to capitalize the price of gas at $1 forever, and fix it forever upon the backs of the people of the District of Columbia to pay interest and dividends on that amount.

Now, I suggested to a gentleman a while ago that if we had a factory here making hats in the District of Columbia it was none of our business at what price they sold their hats and it was none of our business at how much they capitalize; but if we had the power and should pass a law that said every man and boy in the District of Columbia that wears hats must buy them from that company, it would then become our duty to see that that company sold its hats only at a fair profit.

It would likewise become our duty to see that they did not issue so much capital stock that they could not do it. What is the purpose of this section 4? Why, the majority of the committee have come here and said that these gentlemen could increase the capital stock if they wanted to without further action of this House. Does any man in this House believe it?

Does any man with the experience you have had in legislative bodies believe that this gas company would seek the light of publicity, would seek to have its affairs dragged through a Congressional debate if it was not absolutely necessary for it to do so in order to get that opportunity? There would not have been any debate on a simple bill to consolidate, because there never would have been any objection. This bill is introduced for one purpose, and that is to water the stock of this consolidated company from about $4,000,000 actual value of plant to $13,750,000, and that is the main purpose of it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. STEWART] has given his idea as to what the value of the plant is. I want to show you what the value of the plant is on the sworn testimony of the officers of this company taken at various times. In 1881 (see Miscellaneous Document No. 15, Forty-sixth Congress, third session) they made a report to Congress which is signed by the secretary of the company and which gives the actual amount of money invested. It was $1,800,000. In 1886 there was a Senatorial investigation by a committee of the Senate of which Senator SPOONER was chairman.

The president and secretary of the company appeared there and testified what the value of the plant was, what amount had been invested, in 1886, remember, and it was $2,400,000. In 1887 they borrowed $600,000, and they issued certificates of indebtedness for $600,000 more, and they claimed to rebuild their plant and make extensions that would provide for all the business for years to come, and yet, in 1894 Thomas Langsden, who had been until a few months before the engineer and superintendent of the company, testified that the company's plant could be duplicated with all its improvements for from $2,800,000 to $3,000,000.

Now, how much have they invested since 1894? In 1894, in an investigation both in the House and Senate, the testimony showed that, taking it back for years, the average cost of their extensions and improvements, notwithstanding that covered a period of duplication of plant, was $100,000 a year, or, to be accurate, $96,500. Now, if you will add $100,000 for the eight years since the officers of the company swore what its value was, you will find that the total value of this plant, figuring it according to their own testimony, is less than $4,000,000. Yet the District of Columbia Committee have brought in a bill under which they may increase their capital stock to the amount of $13,750,000.

But the majority of the committee say that the company could issue this capital stock without authority from Congress. Then why do they come here? I do not believe it is true, but if it is true, it could be but for one reason, and that is that they might have the authority of Congress behind the issue, in order that when it had reached the hands of innocent purchasers and you attempted hereafter to lower the price of gas, they could come in and say, "By your own bill you said this property was worth $14,000,000, and now you are going to take away from us the power to earn dividends on that amount." The reason they want this act—the reason they want this issue—is because this company is earning so much it can not hide its profits. It was organized in 1848, with a capital of $42,500.

Mr. SIMS. Fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. COWHERD. And if any gentleman doubts the statements I make I have the proof before me. It was organized at $50,000, of which $42,500 was paid in and $7,500 was distributed as a bonus to the subscribers. Between 1848 and 1866 Congress twice authorized an increase in the capital stock; once of $300,000 and once of $150,000, which would increase the capital stock to $500,000.

Now, whether there was a single dollar in cash paid on those increases no man on earth knows, and I will tell you why we do not know: Because, in 1866 this company—the only occasion that I have ever heard of in the United States—by solemn order of its board of directors placed upon its minute books an order to have its books destroyed. They were sold to a paper mill and ground into pulp, so that no man knows how this increase was made, but the reasonable inference as to this increase of $450,000 is that it came from surplus profits, else the books would not have been disposed of.

Now, then, in 1866 the capital stock was increased to a million dollars, and do you know how? By simply dividing out $500,000 additional stock pro rata among the stockholders. But some gentlemen may say, "Oh, well; they simply had been investing their earnings instead of dividing them." Let us see whether they were or not. I have here a statement of the officers of this company, taken from their report to the Forty-sixth Congress, and I find that from 1848 to 1866 they paid for every year of that time in cash dividends 7.6 per cent, and they distributed $500,000 in stock dividends, and, as I have shown, the reasonable proof is that they distributed $450,000 more.

The amount that was invested was $42,500, and on that they paid 7.6 per cent the first four years, and then it was increased to $350,000, on which 7.6 per cent was paid, and then increased to $500,000, on which 7.6 per cent was paid, and in 1886 the capital was increased to $1,000,000 by this distribution of $500,000. In 1872 they came to Congress and got authority to increase their capital stock to $2,000,000.

I want you to note this fact: In that authorization Congress placed this express provision, "That the increase must be paid in cash, and should not come from the surplus dividends and profits." What is the fact? In 1874 they declared a surplus dividend of 50 per cent. In 1876 they declared another surplus dividend of 50 per cent, and the officers of the company, the president of the company and the secretary of the company, admitted, in response to questions of the investigating committee of the Senate, that this surplus dividend was where the cash had come from to increase the stock a million dollars—50 per cent surplus in 1874, which amounted to $500,000; in 1876, $500,000 more—and this was divided pro rata among the stockholders of the company.

Does any gentleman want to call into question whether this was another instance of investing dividends instead of declaring them from year to year? If so, I will read to him the cash dividends of the company from 1867 to 1876, ten years. In 1867 it paid 10 per cent, in 1868 it paid 10 per cent, in 1869 it paid 20 per cent, in 1870 it paid 10 per cent, in 1871 it paid 15 per cent, in 1872 it paid 15 per cent, in 1873 it paid 20 per cent, in 1874 it paid 55 per cent, in 1875 it paid 20 per cent, and in 1876 it paid 65 per cent, being an average of 14 per cent besides the two surplus dividends of 50 per cent each.

In other words, during these ten years this company earned and paid an average cash dividend of 14 per cent on one million, and it divided one million among its stockholders in surplus dividends to pay for the million-dollar increase in its capital stock. Now, then, the stock is up to $2,000,000; this was in 1876. In 1887, as I have said, they issued bonds to the extent of $600,000, and what they called certificates of indebtedness to the same amount. These were certificates divided pro rata among the stockholders, which stated that they had spent $600,000 of dividends belonging to the stockholders, and that the holder's pro rata of that would have been so much, and he was entitled to exchange this certificate for so much stock when Congress gave the authority to issue the stock for it.

The testimony of the assistant superintendent of the company and the secretary of the company is that this was a bonus; that no man ever paid one dollar for those certificates, and yet in 1896 they came to Congress and got authority to take up every dollar of those certificates and issue stock for it; and there is the history of the $2,600,000 of capital stock, not a single dollar of which we know has come from the pocket of any stockholder since 1866, and, according to the best proof obtainable in the case, not a single dollar in cash was ever paid in since the first $42,500 was subscribed.

Do you want to know what the dividends were during the time of this last growth of $600,000? In 1877 the dividends were 15 per cent; in 1878, 15 per cent; in 1879, 15 per cent; in 1880, 15 per cent; in 1881, 10 per cent; in 1882, 10 per cent. Mark you, in 1881 they were having a Congressional investigation, and they found out that the company had a surplus and that they were getting ready to declare another big dividend. They raised the question in the House, and the company stated that that money was not intended for a surplus dividend, but they were going to spend it for improvements in plant, in competition with the Electric Light Company.

Notwithstanding this declaration, in 1883 they declared a dividend of 10 per cent and a surplus of 40 per cent—$1,000,000 dividend on $2,000,000 capital stock. And, mark you, gentlemen, let no man say that is not a fair statement of the capital stock, because less than two years before they declared this million dollars dividend their own officers had sworn that the total investment was $1,800,000.

So you have a company in which its own officers testify there was never invested up to that time more than $1,800,000, declaring dividends in one year of $1,000,000. Oh, gentlemen, this has been a favored company.

In 1884 they declared a dividend of 10 per cent; in 1885 a dividend of 12½ per cent. In 1894—this is the first year that I have since 1884—they declared a dividend of 10 per cent and had a surplus of $280,000. In 1896—and this is the last official report we have—in a report to the Hon. Mr. BABCOCK, chairman of this committee, they admitted paying $600,000 or 30 per cent dividends on the capital stock of two million, and paying 6 per cent interest on these certificates of indebtedness that were outstanding and really intended to be capital stock also. What they are paying now, who knows?

My friend from Wisconsin says 10 per cent. How did he find it out? Why did not that information leak into the possession of the committee? Why did not they come with some officer of the company and state it? Why did not they send an official report to Congress showing it? I believe if the truth were known, there are now in the coffers of that company hundreds of thousands of dollars in undivided dividends, and they only await a large increase of capital stock in order that it may be put out without attracting attention.

Now, then, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the line of argument of the gentleman from Ohio and take up his suggestion as to what ought to be the price of gas in the District of Columbia. I want you to remember this: That there is probably no manufactured article where the cost of manufacture decreases so rapidly as the output increases as it does in the manufacture of gas. The three great items are interest on investment or plant; wages, which includes salaries, and the cost of material.

Now, the plant in Washington for an output of 500,000,000 cubic feet is practically the same as the plant necessary for an output of 1,000,000,000 cubic feet. I want first to take the Washington company as to wages and salaries. I think I can show you by the record of this company that when they increased the output from 700,000,000 to a 1,000,000,000 cubic feet, the expenses of manufacturing were increased practically nothing. They made a report to Congress in 1889, and they reported then that their total expense was $958,407, and the output was 691,000,000 cubic feet, in round numbers. In 1893, four years after, the expenses had increased just $12,390, and the output had increased over 200,000,000 cubic feet.

In other words, selling the gas at $1 a thousand cubic feet, upon increased receipts of $200,000 the expenses increased only $12,000.

But later than that, taking the report made to the chairman of this committee in 1896, and comparing the two items, the item of wages and salaries and the item of cost of materials, with the corresponding items for 1889, we find the increased expense was then only $22,712. Now the output of the plant is 1,300,000,000 feet, and taking the best evidence that I can get, the increased expense has been less than $100,000, and the increased receipts more than $400,000 since 1896.

Now, I want you to remember this reduction of cost on increase of output when we come to the question of fixing the price of gas, because that affects the question which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] asked the gentleman from New York, who lives in a town which, if I remember correctly his statement, has about 8,000 inhabitants, and where the output is about 25,000,000 cubic feet a year. Is that correct?

Mr. STEWART of New York. Thirty-four million.

Mr. COWHERD. What comparison can fairly be made between the price there, $1.25, with such an output as that, with the price in this District, where the output is 1,300,000,000 cubic feet?

Mr. STEWART of New York. The population of the city to which I referred is 25,000.

Mr. COWHERD. Now, there is only one thing which this company is compelled to report, and that is the amount of coal consumed and what it costs. This return is made under an old law, which compels the company to file with the Secretary of the Interior their contracts made every year for coal. They make their contracts in the fall for the purchase of coal for the next year. I have here a copy of the contract made in 1895 and the contract made in 1900. The contract made in 1895 was for the year 1896; the contract made in 1900 was for the year 1901.

I find that in 1896 this company used 35,000 tons of coal, costing them $130,250; and they report that they made only 900,000,000 cubic feet of gas in that year. In 1901 they used only 25,000 tons, costing $87,400; and they admit making 1,300,000,000 cubic feet of gas. In other words, the increased output is 400,000,000 cubic feet or $400,000, and the decrease in this item of coal, which is the second largest item of material, has been $60,000; and they only pretend in a letter to Chairman BABCOCK, dated February 25, 1901, that the increased cost of naphtha was $87,255. It is true they claimed an increase in cost of coal amounting to about $25,000, but in the face of their official report to the Secretary of the Interior I must be permitted to doubt this item.

Now, I want you to remember this on the question of what the price of gas ought to be; for I want to say here, if this bill is to pass in any form this House ought to attach to it a provision, and ought to see to it that the provision is retained when the bill comes back from conference, fixing the price of gas in the District of Columbia at 75 cents a thousand cubic feet.

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me a question for information? My information from reputable citizens, consumers of gas in this city, is that since the reduction of the price of gas from $1.25 per thousand to $1 a thousand these consumers, without any increased use of gas, find that there has been no decrease in their gas bills as presented from month to month. I should like to know whether there has been any testimony on that subject before the committee or any complaints made to the committee along that line.

Mr. COWHERD. Well, I have had a letter or two stating something of that kind. That is the only complaint that I know anything about. There was no testimony before the committee on this matter either last year or this year. There was never a witness brought before the committee on behalf of this company or against it. If we had ever had the opportunity to cross-examine a solitary witness representing this company on this bill, I do not believe that any committee in this House would have had the hardihood to report the bill. So far as those complaints are concerned, I know nothing of them personally. People always complain a good deal about the amount of their gas bills. I have never paid any particular attention to those complaints.

What ought the price of gas to be? I have some figures to which I wished to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, whom, however, I do not see in his seat; and I will therefore call the attention of the House to some figures from the last census, from which the gentleman from Ohio has seen fit to quote.

I find that in 1890 the average cost of gas in the United States, taking the whole country through, big plants and little plants, plants yielding a billion cubic feet output and plants yielding only a few million feet output, plants where coal was cheap, as in Washington, and plants where it costs $7 or $8 a ton, as on the Pacific coast, in 1890, taking the various plants in the United States, the average price of gas was $1.42, while in 1900, according to the census report, the average cost of gas over the whole United States was only $1.03½.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me a moment on that point? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] read some figures showing the capitalization of certain gas companies in a number of large cities, among them, I believe, a company in Kansas City. Now, it would seem as though that capitalization was very large.

Mr. COWHERD. It is too large.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Missouri can tell us the reason for that capitalization and whether the consumers of gas are burdened thereby.

Mr. COWHERD. Undoubtedly it is too large. If the House cares to know, I can inform them of it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to have the gentleman give that information.

Mr. COWHERD. Well, there was an old gas company in Kansas City selling gas at $1.75 per thousand. This was back in 1892. They refused to reduce the price lower than $1.50 to the people, and so a charter was granted in 1894 to a new company to sell gas at $1 a thousand.

The new company came in and built a plant and did as all companies do in organization; it issued so many bonds, which, if I remember rightly, were sold below par; so much stock went with the bonds and so much went to the promoter, and they finally built a new plant, and then the old company put the price of gas down to 50 cents a thousand, and when they put it down to 50 cents a thousand they gave away a gas stove in addition to every consumer, so that everybody got a gas stove, the result of which was that the consumption of gas jumped up from less than 250,000,000 cubic feet to 800,000,000 cubic feet in two or three years.

Finally, then, the old company bought out the new company, having obtained an extension of its charter, and in its consolidation it had to issue additional stock, not only to take care of all the stock and bonds of the new company, including its water, but all of its own and some for the promoters of the consolidation.

Mr. JENKINS. Then, do I understand the gentleman to say that all of the gas companies in Kansas City are composed of corrupt gentlemen?

Mr. COWHERD. Oh, I have stated a fact. If the gentleman from Wisconsin wants to draw a conclusion, he can do so. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin mean to say that any man who favors this bill is corrupt because he knows this bill waters the stock here?—and he will not deny that.

Mr. JENKINS. I do deny it and I am going to deny it.

Mr. COWHERD. Does the gentleman deny that under the provision that permits them to increase the capital stock from $20 to $100, if they can make the market value of it that much, that will represent only the actual investment in the plant?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; and I propose to demonstrate before I get through that you are most miserably mistaken.

Mr. COWHERD. I hope the gentleman will undertake that, because I venture to say the demonstration is absolutely impossible, even by so excellent and distinguished and able a gentleman as the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JENKINS. What I wanted to know was whether your gas company men were corrupt men.

Mr. COWHERD. I have stated the facts. The gentleman can draw his own conclusion. I do not say a man is corrupt——

Mr. JENKINS. Oh, I do not want to draw any conclusions as to gentlemen in Kansas City.

Mr. COWHERD. I do not say a man is corrupt if the council gives him the right upon a plant that is worth $100,000 to issue stock to a million dollars and to charge a sum that will pay dividends on it, and he goes to work and issues it and sells the stock on the market—I do not say that man is corrupt—but I do say that the common council which gave him that authority is corrupt. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Then the common council of the city of Kansas City have been composed of corrupt men, have they?

Mr. COWHERD. Oh, sometimes there have been gentlemen there who probably did not reach the standard which Cæsar insisted his wife should maintain. [Prolonged laughter.] That I have heard, and I have heard it of many common councils, but there was no corruption in the granting of the franchises I have referred to. They were in a position where the old company had a franchise they could not control, and so they granted one to a new company, and that company watered its stock, and the council had no power to fix or limit the capital stock of the company.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to know whether in order to defeat this bill it is necessary to smirch every man doing business in Kansas City.

Mr. COWHERD. Oh, no; it is not necessary to smirch any man doing business there, and I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I am perfectly willing to have my statement in regard to these gas companies circulated with everybody there, because I had something to do with fighting that deal when they tried to get a franchise through at $1.50 in that city, and I am willing they should know there I am fighting this bill.

Now, I was trying to show what ought to be the fair price for gas. I started to refer to some of the census statistics. I have shown that in ten years the average cost has been reduced 38½ cents all over the United States. I want to say in regard to that that the average cost of gas in the State of New York is only 95⅞ cents, and that covers big plants and little ones. Throughout the entire North Atlantic division, covering States like Maine and New Hampshire and Vermont, where there is hardly a single large gas plant in existence, the average price of gas is only 98½ cents.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman refer to the cost of manufacture or to the cost to the consumer?

Mr. COWHERD. I refer to the reported price by the company at which it is sold to the consumer. In the entire State of Pennsylvania the cost to the consumer is 83.2 cents. In the city of Chicago it is 87 cents. In the city of Cleveland it is 75 cents, and that company has never yet failed to issue a 6 per cent dividend, and there is said to be a considerable amount of water in its stock. In the city of Cincinnati—and I notice my friend from Cincinnati was applauding the statements of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS]—where the cost of coal may be a little bit cheaper, but where oil would be no cheaper than it is here, the price of illuminating gas is only 85 cents, and they sell fuel gas at 50 cents besides.

In the city of Milwaukee—and let me call attention to the fact that the output of the plant at Cleveland is about the same as this—they sell gas as low as 80 cents, and no illuminating gas is sold higher than a dollar, and they sell a fuel gas for 60 cents. In the city of Hamilton, to which I called the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], because it was in his own State, with a little plant that has an output of only 60,000,000, they sell 25-candlepower illuminating gas at 80 cents a thousand. Now, what ought to be the price of gas here? I venture to say there is no man in the United States, except some gas expert, that knows what it costs to produce gas to-day.

The fact is, that has been concealed as carefully or more carefully than any other business secret in the whole business history of the United States. But in 1899 an examination was made by the Bureau of Labor here in the city of Washington, and they got reports from all over the United States, and they attempted to find out in some way what was the fair price for gas. Now, I am not sufficient of an expert to figure out these tables, but I have here a portion of them that has been figured out by the Commissioner himself, and this is his report. He reports that there is one company operating 12 plants in 12 cities of the United States, or, rather, there are 12 companies who operate the plants under one management.

He reports that the total value of their property is $10,000,000. The total output is 3,176,000,000 cubic feet. Now, mind you, that is a little over 250,000,000 cubic feet to each one of the 12 plants, so that they can not afford to make gas anything like as cheaply as they do here, where the output is 1,300,000,000. Do you know what it costs these companies to furnish gas to the consumer? Not to put it in the holder, but to furnish it to the consumer. Here is the report of the Bureau of Labor:

From these statements it is seen that the average cost of production—

And, mind you, this includes wages and salaries and distribution and all kinds of expenses—excluding depreciation, taxes, and interest on the investment, is 23 cents per thousand cubic feet.

But including taxes, including depreciation, including interest on the investment at 3½ per cent, including all expenses, the cost is 42 cents per thousand feet.

Mr. DALZELL. Where is that?

Mr. COWHERD. That is in 12 cities of the United States. The average cost in these 12 cities, where the output of the entire 12 is only 3,176,000,000 cubic feet, is 42 cents per thousand.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. What is the corporate name of that company?

Mr. COWHERD. One moment. If 3½ per cent is too small for interest on the investment, make that interest 6 per cent, and you have the cost of gas only 50 cents a thousand feet.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. What is the company called?

Mr. COWHERD. I will say to the gentleman that the Bureau of Labor does not give the names of any of the companies. It designates them by number. It says it is a trade secret and it would not be fair to give their reports to the public, so we can not get what the name of the company is; but this statement is found on page 386 of the report of 1899 of the Bureau of Labor.

Now, I give these facts to the House in order to show first that this company has been the most favored corporation that ever existed in the District of Columbia, as far as my knowledge goes; that this company, paying dividends that can not be equaled in any other business investment, has grown from $42,500 to $2,600,000 in capital stock without a single additional dollar of cost to its stockholders; that this company to-day in all probability is making about 50 per cent net profit on every thousand cubic feet of gas that it sells, and it is selling 1,300,000,000 cubic feet per year. I give these facts to this committee first in the hope that this committee will absolutely defeat this bill, and I want to say why.

I fear if this bill should pass in any form that in the further stages of legislation it will be put in such shape that it will be entirely satisfactory to the company, and when it has passed through the hands of a conference committee it can be rushed through and we can not have an opportunity to protest, and it can be taken up at a time probably when only friends of the bill are present. Therefore I hope the bill will be absolutely beaten. But if you will pass it, there are two things you ought to do.

You ought to limit the capitalization of the company to the actual value of the plant, and I do not want that value found by any three disinterested men, whether they are selected by the court or selected by the company or selected by arbitrators. If you are going to find the actual value of the plant, find it by the court itself, by the men who are clothed with authority, men who are in office and responsible for their official deeds. That is the first thing you ought to do. The next thing you ought to do is to put on here an amendment reducing the price of gas in the District of Columbia to 75 cents a thousand feet, and then the company would earn a fair profit.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest to the gentleman right there, suppose you had a hearing before the court, would it not necessarily be an ex parte hearing on which the evidence would be adduced by the gaslight company with no one to represent the other side?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes; and I do not believe we ought to pass a bill that would let the court fix it. I think we ought to have a hearing before our own committees and that we ought to fix the value ourselves.

Mr. RAY of New York. I was going to ask the gentleman what is the objection to letting the Committee on the District of Columbia make the inquiry for itself, call the witnesses before it, and get at all the facts?

Mr. COWHERD. I think that is what ought to be done. We ought to have a hearing. We ought to get at the facts. We ought to report to this House, and this House ought to fix the amount of the capitalization. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have occupied more time than I intended, and I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. RAY of New York. There is one other question, before you take your seat. If this company is making the enormous profits which are alleged, and I have no doubt they are, why is it that some other company does not start in and compete?

Mr. COWHERD. Of course other companies have come in asking for franchises, and they have been refused.

Mr. RAY of New York. Is not the fact that the want of competition in this gas business here is because Congress has refused to charter any other company?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes, it is; and I want to say——

Mr. RAY of New York. Therefore Congress has actually made a monopoly of this company?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes.

Mr. RAY of New York. And now if we pass this bill, we allow them to water their stock five times, and in effect we will fix in perpetuity the price of gas at a dollar a thousand feet.

Mr. COWHERD. I think that is the purpose of this bill. That is my candid opinion.

Mr. RAY of New York. In other words, create a trust by our own action, in perpetuity.

Mr. COWHERD. That is my opinion. And let me say to the gentleman, as far as the monopoly is concerned, my own opinion is that there should be but one gas company in a city. To have two gas companies means the digging up of your streets twice. It means a doubling of the investments and in the end always has resulted in the United States in a consolidation of the companies and the necessity of the people paying dividends on this double investment.

Mr. JENKINS. Now, the gentleman from Missouri has already answered one question that I wished to ask, but I will ask him this: When was it that Congress ever refused to grant corporate rights to another company in the District?

Mr. COWHERD. I thank the gentleman for the statement, and that reminds me of the fact——

Mr. JENKINS. When was it that Congress ever refused corporate rights to another company to enter the District?

Mr. COWHERD. I do not know.

Mr. JENKINS. But the gentleman from Missouri, in answer to a question of the gentleman from New York, said that Congress had refused.

Mr. COWHERD. Well, let me finish my answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin and I will tell him.

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. Very well. I will do so. I do not know what year, but I refer to reports of committees of the Senate, presided over by Mr. SPOONER and Mr. Hunton, and in that report and the evidence there taken it shows that Congress has always given this company a monopoly and has always refused to grant a franchise to any other company. I suppose that the Senate knew what it was talking about. I know that there is a bill now pending before our committee——

Mr. JENKINS. There has been no application within the last ten years, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. COWHERD. I do not know about that. There has been no application since I have been a member of the committee, as far as I know, except the one now pending. But here is the report of the Senate, in which it says that Congress has always given this company a monopoly. That was in 1894.

Mr. JENKINS. I understood the gentleman from Missouri to state that Congress had refused to give a franchise to another company, and I would like him to state when that was.

Mr. COWHERD. I made that statement upon the official reports and hearing before a committee of the Senate of the United States, and I think it is true.

Now, that brings us up to another question, and I ask the attention of the House while I call their attention to what seems to me to be a piece of nerve on the part of this company that has never been equaled. In 1894 this House passed a bill reducing the price of gas to $1 a thousand. It went to the Senate, and if I may be permitted to speak in debate as to what occurred in that body, a report was made adverse to this bill, and this was the reason given:

The committee of the Senate said it was the policy of the Government of the United States to permit this company to not only pay interest and dividends and cost of depreciation and manufacture, but permit this company to gather up profits large enoug to build its plant out of the profits. They said it was better to let them gather in from the people in addition to all other legitimate items of profit a sum sufficient to enable them to make all extensions and improvements, keeping the capitalization down to a small figure, rather than to issue capital stock and bonds and to build the plant out of that, because if you keep the capital stock to a small figure you can regulate the price of gas. Now, having built their plant out of profits, they come and ask us to enable them to capitalize not only those profits but the present price of gas. To that proposition I can not give my consent.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time. [Loud applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, is any time going to be consumed on the other side?

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman can take time now if he wants to.

Mr. SIMS. I would like to have some gentleman who is in favor of this bill come forward now and occupy some of the time.

Mr. JENKINS. Let the gentleman take care of his side and we will take care of ours.

Mr. SIMS. All right, Mr. Chairman, I will accept the challenge.

I hope I may have order. I do not make this appeal because of any personal feeling as to the merit of what I may say. But I want, when this vote is taken, for those gentlemen who have had so much to say about trusts and monopolies, if they vote for this bill, to know that they shall not be able to excuse themselves on account of ignorance of its contents.

I want to say frankly to this House, Mr. Chairman, that the weight which usually attaches to the proper deliberations and actions of a committee, a great committee of this House, upon a bill does not attach in this case and ought not to, and I will show you the reason. I know it is a common thing for gentlemen to come up here and vote with the committee; and it is a proper practice and custom, because usually the committee investigates and finds the facts and reports them to the House. This information, given by the committee, should be given great weight in the House. I want to show you what the action of the District Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, has been in this particular case, and see then whether you will like to vote with the committee just because the majority has reported the bill.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a political question. It is not a majority question. You can be for or against this bill and be a Democrat, a Republican, or a Populist. I want to go over the work of my own committee; not the work, but the failure to work. You who were in this House last winter know that a bill was introduced and referred to the District Committee to recapitalize. No, that is only a part.

Mr. JENKINS. While the gentleman is taking a drink of water, will he consent to an interruption?

Mr. SIMS. I always yield to the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. JENKINS. Were you not one of the advocates of the payment of the claim to the Methodist Book Concern by this House?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JENKINS. Did you vote for it?

Mr. SIMS. Yes, sir. While the money was undoubtedly due, I would vote to return it, even though it went to my own State. I will vote to return every dollar of it. I challenge any man to give me an opportunity to do so. I never will approve of the methods by which it was obtained, and I unqualifiedly so stated shortly after the bill was passed, before the Senate committee that investigated the matter. A bill was introduced and referred to this committee on the 8th day of January, 1901. It lay in soak a week or ten days. No man came in to champion it and no man came in to oppose it. No man was heard for or against it. Another was introduced on the 17th, reported favorably on the 19th, and taken up in this House and pushed for a vote on the 21st.

Oh, what a waste of time the committee did devote to the investigation of the affairs of this company! Do not you feel proud of your work? Introduced on the 8th, amended and reintroduced on the 17th, reported on the 19th, and brought to a hearing in the House on the 21st. What was the result? That bill was for several purposes. One was to consolidate the Georgetown and Washington Gaslight companies, which no man has ever opposed. This is a mere hypocritical pretense; it is only to drag through the nefarious proposition of recapitalization. A bill simply to consolidate these companies would pass without a word of opposition, and every man on the committee knows it.

That bill was for the consolidation of the gas companies, and then to capitalize them upon a basis of 4 per cent of the net earnings. The committee promptly voted in favor of it and brought in amendments making it 4 per cent upon the net earnings as determined by the supreme court of the District. They undertook to rush it through this House, and what did it meet with? It met with humiliating defeat. The distinguished chairman of the committee held up both hands and said, "Lord, have mercy on us, and let me take it back before it gets cold." [Laughter.]

When the motion to recommit was voted upon, what else went with it? There were instructions by a solemn vote of this House, and let me show you what those instructions were. Now, remember, after consideration of that bill by this House in Committee of the Whole, the House solemnly voted the following instructions to the committee when the bill was recommitted:

> On and after July 1, 1902, the Washington Gaslight Company shall furnish gas to the people of the District of Columbia for 90 cents per 1,000 cubic feet; on and after July 1, 1903, at 80 cents per thousand cubic feet; on and after July 1, 1904, for 75 cents per 1,000 cubic feet.

There was a clear and explicit instruction by vote of the House directing the Committee on the District of Columbia to so report. How did they obey? Remember that that vote was given on the 21st day of January, 1901. The bill was recommitted, and not a witness, no mortal man, went before that committee. No evidence was taken, and the District Committee, with an entirely contemptuous disregard of the vote in this House, failed to act on these instructions until when? Until the 1st day of March, 1901.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, a message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

RELIEF FOR THE CITIZENS OF THE FRENCH WEST INDIES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message, in writing, from the President of the United States; which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

One of the greatest calamities in history has fallen upon our neighboring island of Martinique. The consul of the United States at Guadeloupe has telegraphed from Fort de France, under date of yesterday, that the disaster is complete; that the city of St. Pierre has ceased to exist; and that the American consul and his family have perished. He is informed that 30,000 people have lost their lives and that 50,000 are homeless and hungry; that there is urgent need of all kinds of provisions, and that the visit of vessels for the work of supply and rescue is imperatively required.

The Government of France, while expressing their thanks for the marks of sympathy which have reached them from America, inform us that Fort de France and the entire island of Martinique are still threatened. They therefore request that, for the purpose of rescuing the people who are in such deadly peril and threatened with starvation, the Government of the United States may send, as soon as possible, the means of transporting them from the stricken island. The island of St. Vincent and, perhaps, others in that region are also seriously menanced by the calamity which has taken so appalling a form in Martinique.

I have directed the departments of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy to take such measures for the relief of these stricken people as lies within the Executive discretion, and I earnestly commend this case of unexampled disaster to the generous consideration of the Congress. For this purpose I recommend that an appropriation of $500,000 be made, to be immediately available.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 12, 1902.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN GASLIGHT COMPANIES.

The Committee resumed its session.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, for some months after this committee had been instructed to report back a bill fixing the price of gas as I have stated, they absolutely did nothing. On the 1st day of March they made a report against reduction. They made this report at a time when it was known by the gentlemen who joined in making the report that it would not be and could not be considered at that session.

Does this look as if this committee were taking care of the interests of the people of the District of Columbia and the interests of the Government of the United States equally and justly and fairly? They were ready to rush a bill through in three days, but after the bill had been recommitted to them with instructions they kept the bill until the 1st day of March before reporting it—only three days of the session remaining—they knowing that no action could be taken; and yet we are asked here to give weight to the recommendations of a committee that has shown itself to be entirely biased and one-sided.

Now, let us look at things as they are at the present time. The last report I have seen coming from this company bears date 1895, seven years ago. A bill is introduced to consolidate—which nobody has ever objected to—and to recapitalize upon the actual value of the property of this company, that value to be ascertained by the market value of the stock ninety days in the future, notice of which was to be given, so that the people who would make it their business to take care of the value of the stock by looking after the sales would have prompt and due notice so that they might know just what to bid. And there were no limitations fixed upon this provision. There was no limit upon the number of shares to be sold or upon the price. There was no limitation upon anything. This was an absolute stock-jobbing and stock-watering scheme, which they undertook to carry through by legislation—a scheme to be put into operation here at the national capital, where the Government is the consumer of something like one-fourth of the output of gas, the poor, unrepresented people of this District consuming the rest; and let me say, in this connection, that I think this matter appeals more strongly to members of this House than it would if the people of this District had representation on this floor. They have none.

And there is another consideration. It is a known fact, although it does not appear in the report, that the well-to-do people of this District are using electric light to-day; it is the poorer and the less wealthy who have to use gas. This bill was introduced originally in the shape I have stated. We have now another bill before us. A similar bill was first introduced without any limitation whatever. This bill was introduced on the 7th of April, 1902, with a single change by way of limitation, providing that the shares of the new stock should not be greater in number than the authorized number of shares of the existing company. Remember that the present stock is in shares of $20 each, par value, and if there should be a reissue at $100 per share, par value, as is sought to be accomplished in this bill, it would be an increase of 5 to 1. This is the limitation which was inserted in the new bill introduced on the 7th of April, and lauded in the report as a safeguard against overcapitalization, should there be any desire to accomplish such a result.

When was that bill introduced? As I have said, on the 7th of April, 1902. Now, hear, ye who have ears to hear, when was that bill reported? Here is the report, Report No. 1469, presented on the 7th day of April, 1902. Look what a long season of investigation. Not a word as to surplus on hand; not a word as to the salary account; not a word as to the amount of additional improvements; not a word with reference to this last Congressional investigation. The committee simply says, "Here is what the company wants, and here is what we propose to give them." That is the effect of the bill; that is what it means, as the action of the committee shows. This is the report made without any investigation so far as the committee is concerned. I do not know what one gentleman may have said to another in private conversation. I know much was said to me in that way, but I would not repeat it in this House because it would not be proper to do so.

But I want to appeal again to the good judgment of this House and ask how much consideration and weight is due to the deliberations of a committee that has not deliberated—to the information of a committee that has not taken the trouble to inform itself.

Why, sir, I would not have objected to reasonable recapitalization in accordance with the value of this property—its actual value. I do not to-day make any such objection. But my Heavens! How can I know anything about what its actual value is? Last winter when a motion was made to recommit the then pending bill with instructions to reduce the price of gas I voted against the motion because I had not sufficient information. I did not know what action would be just, and I did not want to do anything which might be a wrong to this company or anybody else. Here we are, a year and several months later—that much older, and the Lord only knows how much less wise! I have described the measure before you. You are asked to come up here and increase the capitalization of this company or these two companies from the present capitalization, $2,750,000, to $13,750,000. Will any gentleman point me to a case of overcapitalization in any public-service corporation in the United States that will compare to the proposed overcapitalization of this corporation?

I do not know whether this company is selling gas too high or too low, because they have furnished us no information. I do not propose to be radical or extreme in my action. I have a theory and a position which another gentleman has stated better than I can. I want to read his language. It is very short. Now, gentlemen, listen to this, for it is not my language. This is the language of a gentleman worthy of your attention:

> I maintain that it should be the policy of the Government in the District of Columbia to keep the capital stock and bonded indebtedness of every corporation at the lowest possible amount, and to allow them to have an income annually from receipts to make the extensions which are essential in the development of this city. I hold that it is a true business proposition that if you keep the capital stock down dividends will also be kept down.

That speech was delivered in 1896, on May 18, in the Senate of the United States by the honorable, distinguished, and able Senator, Charles J. Faulkner, of West Virginia. I plant myself upon that statement. It was true and just then, it is true and just now, that you should hold them down to the lowest possible amount. Why, take that proposition there laid down by the distinguished Senator at that time, and you could not increase this stock a dollar. Hold it down. Let them improve out of the earnings, and then dividends will take care of themselves. That is my position to-day. I learned this from that and other sources, equally as good. I am willing to follow all such doctrines and apply them to any city in the United States, but this is a Federal city. In this city, one-half of its burdens are paid by taxation on the people of the United States. This Government is a consumer of the products of this company and certainly we should not in any form authorize a capitalization of any kind, by hook or crook, that will prevent this Congress at any time it may see fit from reducing the price of gas, should circumstances justify it, to the lowest possible price commensurate with just returns on the capital actually invested.

What do these gentlemen want? Last winter they wanted a capitalization upon 4 per cent of their net earnings. This winter they want a capitalization upon the value of stock to be sold in the future. What do these gentlemen want? Do they look like gentlemen simply wanting justice, simply wanting that which is reasonable and right and businesslike? The records condemn any such statements and refute any such pretense on the part of anybody with information on this subject. I do not care what the dividends are. I do not care if they are 10 or 5 or 20 per cent, provided the service is good and reasonable. What is the difference to the owner of a share of stock of the par value of $20 which he can sell for $80 and on which a dividend is earned at the rate of $80, or a share of stock for $100 which he can sell for only $80 and on which a dividend is paid for no more than $80? Take this capital stock as it stands, and at the present basis of 10 per cent dividends it means $275,000 a year. Increase it as proposed in this bill, and 4 per cent upon the new stock issued will be double that, or $550,000 a year at the present price of gas.

I have objected to the proposition to amend by putting in three disinterested men. Of course that is a good qualification, but who are they? We do not know. I do not think Congress ought to turn this Federal corporation in this Federal city over to be treated by three men appointed by any court whose action is to be final and not reviewed or confirmed by a court. That is my objection to that. Now, then, there is another question. There is a law—the law of 1896—the very act that Senator Faulkner was discussing, from which I have diverged, which provides how to issue capital stock in these two companies. Why not follow that? Congress passed that law after great deliberation, and then they had hearings, and then they had proof and reports, and they provided that it should be authorized by the supreme court of the District of Columbia upon the actual value of the properties ascertained by them in their own way and by their own methods. That made a great high court responsible for this action. Congress did not thus seek to deprive itself of revisory power by turning it over to three men. Certainly if such an amendment is to go in this bill it ought to provide that the court should confirm or refuse to adopt the action, whatever it is.

But gentlemen who know so much more about gas matters than I do—my colleagues who joined in this minority report—say the bill ought to be defeated and let a bill come in with proper investigation; let this company inform the House of its condition, and then let us give them a capital stock that is just to them. I have heard some of the gentlemen interested say that they only wanted such a capital as would not invite raids; that would be in the nature of a protection against unjust and unreasonable demands. For one, I do not object to it; but how is Congress to act without information, without knowledge, without consideration by this or some other committee that will consider and hear the matter? Every line of the bill can be stricken out except the consolidation feature, and I will certainly most cheerfully vote for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one side of this question has been so thoroughly discussed that I do not care to string it out further; but I wanted the House to see just how we had acted and how much weight should be given to the action of a committee which has acted without consideration, without hearing, without proof.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did anybody oppose the bill in the hearing before the committee?

Mr. SIMS. When the bill was introduced on the 7th and reported on the 7th, who had time to oppose it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. But did anyone appear before the District Committee in opposition to this bill?

Mr. SIMS. No man appeared before the committee to oppose it and no man appeared to favor it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will ask the gentleman if it was not before our committee for weeks for our consideration, and no opposition to it?

Mr. SIMS. A bill which has not been reported was before our committee for several weeks—I do not remember how many.

Mr. MUDD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MUDD. I apprehend the gentleman does not wish intentionally to misrepresent the facts?

Mr. SIMS. No; I do not.

Mr. MUDD. Does not the gentleman know that a bill was introduced and before our committee for nearly two months, and that this bill is merely the bill which was introduced by the chairman as a substitute, with the amendments which were agreed upon incorporated in it?

Mr. SIMS. I think that is substantially correct.

Mr. MUDD. Does the gentleman want to make this House believe—that which he must know is not in accord with the facts—that the committee reported the bill the same day it was introduced?

Mr. SIMS. This bill was reported the same day it was introduced; but I have stated that it was changed only by introducing the limitation. That was the only change from the bill that was introduced before the committee quite a long while before.

Mr. MUDD. In other words, this bill is the bill originally introduced and before the committee for nearly two months, and that was fully considered, and that no one objected to from any source, with the addition of the amendments agreed upon by the committee and introduced by the chairman of the committee, including the amendments that the committee considered ought to go before the House.

Mr. SIMS. I do not remember just when the bill was introduced. If the gentleman can tell me or have the clerk of the committee tell him, I should be glad to have the date.

Mr. MUDD. I do not recall the exact time. I know this bill was before the committee and was called to the attention of the committee four or five times, and there was full opportunity for consideration by members of the committee, and that it was postponed several times because one member or another was sick.

Mr. SIMS. That is true, but I do not remember the exact date of the introduction of the bill. If the gentleman can give me that information, I shall be glad to have it.

Mr. MUDD. I am told that it was introduced on February 10.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I am able to answer the gentleman's question. The bill was originally introduced on February 10, and reported April 7, which is not two months.

Mr. MUDD. It is not very far from it.

Mr. SIMS. No, it is not far wrong. You are substantially correct, as you are generally; but it was introduced February 10, and without one word of proof or one word of hearing or one word of information to the committee, the gentleman who just addressed me voted for it to be favorably reported on April 7.

Mr. MUDD. If the gentleman will allow me one word right there, the chief matter under consideration and in controversy in that bill was the matter of capitalization. It was not the price of gas, and the gentleman never raised that question nor did anyone else.

Mr. SIMS. The bill did not propose to deal with the price of gas; therefore it was not necessary nor incumbent to ascertain the price of gas except as an incident to a proper investigation with reference to capitalization. But the bill did propose a recapitalization.

Mr. MUDD. That is right.

Mr. SIMS. And the limit of capitalization was not fixed until April 7. The amendment shows this; and it was absolutely necessary in order for us to know whether the recapitalization was just or not that we should have hearings and know the value of the property, its surplus, its earnings, its salaried account, and every item pertaining to its business. But no witnesses came before the committee, and the gentleman voted for the bill as it is without information so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. MUDD. Does the gentleman think we should examine witnesses as to the method of capitalization of a company? I do not understand that the committee felt called upon to hear witnesses in order to determine that question. If the gentleman wanted witnesses, as he seems to think that what the committee did was indefensible without having heard witnesses, why did not he himself ask for a hearing for such as may have desired to appear?

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman admit that upon the mere demand of a public-service corporation, that serves the unrepresented good people of this District, he is willing to give them power to capitalize their property at five to one of its existing capitalization?

Mr. MUDD. As to the watering of stock, which the gentleman seems to think possible under this bill, that is a question about which I know very little. There ought to be some correspondence between the face and the market value. But the question to which I had arisen was that the gentleman had said that there was no hearing, and I say that there was no demand for a hearing, and that the bill was not introduced in hot haste and rushed through, as the gentleman has stated here. No one in this city appeared before the committee and opposed this bill. I want to say that to the House as a matter of fact.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, with the permission of the gentleman who has the floor [Mr. SIMS], I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland a question or two.

Mr. MUDD. I will answer the questions of the gentleman as to the matters of fact. I do not propose to be called up and catechised on any theory that he may entertain and which I have not touched upon.

Mr. RAY of New York. I do not have any theories. I want a little information. I understand the gentleman is on the committee that reported this bill?

Mr. MUDD. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY of New York. Well, then, I would like to know what information you had before the committee as to the actual value of the property owned by this company, real and personal.

Mr. MUDD. I can not say that we had anything specific as to that.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then I suppose you had none. I would like to ask the gentleman, further, upon what basis did you vote for this proposition that deliberately gives to this company authority to increase the capitalization or valuation of that stock from about three to thirteen millions and over?

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I say the committee never proposed to do anything of the kind. The plan of capitalization which the committee proposed was this: That the face value of the stock should correspond with and the aggregate capitalization should not exceed the actual market value within three months after the reorganization. In other words, we thought that the face value should have some correspondence to the actual market value. There was no stock-watering proposition contemplated by the committee; but the object I had in interrupting was to deny that this question has been brought in hot haste before the House, and I say that any such an assumption was erroneous in point of fact.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then, if the gentleman will permit me, does the gentleman advocate that a legislative body which creates a corporation should permit it to increase its stock, to double its capital stock whenever it is found the par value has doubled in the market?

Mr. MUDD. Well, if that were the condition, and it appeared to be reached under circumstances that gave color to the charge of stock watering, there should properly be a limitation on the stock. And I want to say in this connection that the committee is willing this matter of the issue of stock shall be safeguarded by any reasonable provision in the nature of a regulation or limitation that anybody in the House might offer.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has made an admission upon which certainly this House can act. It has had no information upon several of these questions. Can you tell how large the surplus of this company is? Can you tell how much the laying of the mains has cost since 1894; how many miles of mains they have now? No information of that kind has been given to the committee, or to the House, and yet the House is asked to authorize the capitalization based absolutely on an unknown quantity according to the gentleman's own admission. [Applause.]

Now, that is a wonderful argument on which to ask the serious consideration and action of this House. We have no information which is worth anything as to the actual value. The bill was reported the same day, as the gentleman showed, the other was introduced, in February, without any consideration, without proof, without hearing any information, with nothing only the most noble, generous, good will of the majority of the committee in charge of the legislative measure.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee why it is that he desires this information to give to the House? He did not get it as a member of the committee.

Mr. SIMS. I am unable to get it now from the distinguished gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. MUDD]. I do not believe the committee has it. I do not believe the gentleman himself has it, although he is ready to vote for this bill without any information, apparently. I only know of one good rule when you do not know, and that is, when you are uninformed do not support the positive side of any question. Why not have a bill introduced here to consolidate and recapitalize this company and have hearings and let us know the facts; and then when we have acted let nothing come up in our rear of which we shall be ashamed the balance of our days?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is it not a fact, if the gentleman will allow me an interruption, that at the last Congress a similar bill was before the House and nobody appeared before the committee to approve or disapprove the bill, and for that reason and others important it was sent back to the committee?

Mr. SIMS. That is certainly true. The strength of this bill is purely unlimited ignorance of the affairs of the company, and the gentleman in charge of it knows that as well as anybody else. These gentlemen have withheld all information if they ever had it. I do not want to vote to reduce the price of gas to 75 cents. It may be it is too high, that it is higher than it ought to be, but, not being a gas expert, I do not want to vote to reduce it to that figure without investigation, for I might be doing an injustice. But when you provide for an unreasonable issue of stock, then a just and reasonable limitation in the price of gas must be made. There is no proposition better settled in the law than that.

We are not injuring these gentlemen. If they can sell a twenty-dollar share of stock for $80 and draw dividends on it at that amount, what great public demand is there that this House shall stop national business of importance in order to recapitalize their companies from $2,700,000 so that it may be possible by manipulation to make it $13,750,000?

I want to tell gentlemen in this House that if there are enough members who will stand by us, that you gentlemen have got to go on record in voting for this bill, and when you do it I imagine you will have a manacle about your necks that when you go about talking of the beef trust and the steel trust or any other trust you will have to exhibit a label of "gas trust" in the national city which had no representation, in which the Government was a one-fourth consumer, made possible by your votes. I have no personal ill-feeling against any gentleman on the committee; they are my personal friends and I am glad to number them among my friends; I only allude to their action as a committee. I have not intentionally misstated a single fact. The committee admits that it is without information, and here is a proposition to capitalize, or make it possible to capitalize, companies whose capital is now a little over two million to thirteen million. The consumers of gas in the city of Washington have got to bear the burden put upon them for future years. You are legislating for the people in the future who are manacled and have no power to represent themselves. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how much time I have left, but I will reserve what I have for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HILL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2036) granting an increase of pension to Etta Adair Anderson.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN GASLIGHT COMPANIES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important matter, and it seems to me that members ought to listen to it. I am going to call for a quorum, for I do not think there is a quorum here, and I think we ought to have it. I do not wish to block business, but I think members ought to be here and listen to this debate.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is nothing that requires a quorum to be present when there is debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that a quorum is necessary at all times.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not wish to detain the House, but I want a quorum to listen to this debate.

Mr. JENKINS. It is very evident, Mr. Chairman, that a quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I see that many members have come into the Chamber since the Chair began to count. I am satisfied that a quorum is now present, and I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted). A quorum of the committee is present.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be concluded at half-past 3.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I object to that, Mr. Chairman. I desire to take the floor if nobody else desires to be heard.

Mr. COWHERD. I think if the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me——

Mr. JENKINS. I withdraw the request, Mr. Chairman; I do not care how long the question is discussed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that some member of the committee desires to occupy the floor, and I will yield now and ask to be recognized later.

Mr. STEWART of New York. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 28 minutes.

Mr. STEWART of New York. I desire to yield ten minutes to my colleague from New York, Mr. DRISCOLL.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I was requested to read this bill. I did so, and it struck me as so extraordinary and barefaced in its provisions that I went to the report of the committee to see what they had to say about it. But the report of the majority of this committee is very brief, and not very luminous. It does not give the history in detail of these companies, or either of them. It does not state the ways and means by which the capitalization of this company has been increased from year to year. It does not state the dividends received by the stockholders of these corporations from year to year. In fact, it does not state any fact which we ought to know on this important question before we legislate upon it; for, Mr. Chairman, this is an important question—more important than the few million dollars which this bill proposes to put into the hands of this monopoly, more important than the few million dollars which it is proposed to take from the people of the District of Columbia, and from the Government of the United States, which is also a consumer of the gas furnished by this company.

At the present time our President and our Attorney-General are trying to clip the wings of the meat magnates out West. They are trying to stop their extortionate demands upon the poor people. Now, if we can not legislate directly against combinations and monopolies, we certainly ought not by positive and active legislation favor a monopoly, trust, and combine. We should put ourselves right on this question now.

What are the objects of this bill? As stated, the first object is that the people beyond Rock Creek, over in Georgetown, may have gas for $1 per thousand feet. Let me ask, Is there no other way to reduce the price of gas 25 cents per thousand to those people aside from increasing the capital stock of this company fivefold? Has this Congress no jurisdiction or power over this corporation, which it created?

The second avowed object is that these two companies may be consolidated in order that there may be one set of books and one set of officers. Generally, that sort of proceeding reduces expenses—is along the line of economy. But let me ask, Is it necessary in order to accomplish this economical arrangement that the stock be increased fivefold?

What is the reason we should give this company several million dollars by this act of legislation? Is this company in dire necessity? Is it poor? Has it done anything for which this Congress is under obligation to it? Has it rendered some great service to the public or to the country or to anybody? It was organized in 1848 with a capital of $50,000—$42,500 paid in cash and $7,500 in capital stock passed around as a bonus. Did it have any chance to lose? Why, sir, the method of manufacturing gas was not an occult science. It was well known. Plenty of coal was near by; plenty of water was in the Potomac. The materials for making gas were abundant. This was a monopoly. It took no chances of loss, because it could always charge enough, and Congress would support it in charging enough, to return fair dividends on its stock and on its investments. Therefore, I say, it took no chances of losing. Why, then, should it be favored by this Congress to the extent of several million dollars? Why should it be favored by increasing every $20 share of its stock to $100 par value, in order that it may reap dividends in the future on this increased capitalization?

The committee say in their report that this company has been conducted along the lines of good business management. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I admit it—most excellent business management! From a capital of $50,000, it has by means of this excellent management increased year after year until it has now a capital of $2,600,000. And this has been gathered in from the people in the form of dividends by reason of the price which has been charged for gas; and all this time this company has been paying from 10 to 65 per cent annual dividends. Oh, yes; there has been most excellent management on the part of this company.

But why have they obtained such large rewards, such great returns? Because Congress has permitted them to charge such a price for gas that they could increase their capitalization from their profits from $50,000 to $2,600,000 and pay these enormous dividends besides. It is because this Congress has permitted this monopoly to impose upon the people. And, sir, if this company succeeds in humbugging this Congress now to permit them to increase the stock from $2,600,000 to $13,000,000, that also will be a stroke of most excellent business management on the part of this company.

What is the next reason why this capital stock should be increased? Why, they say it should be done in order that the people of the District of Columbia may receive their gas at a uniform rate. For this reason they want to increase the capitalization from $2,600,000 to $13,000,000. Well, gentlemen, that is an old argument. It may be plausible, but it is a foxy argument. It seems to me I have heard it before. Why, sir, away back years ago when the Standard Oil Company wished to get a monopoly they said, "In order that the poor people may receive oil at a uniform rate we want to drive all competition out of the market." And they did so. Later on the coal barons said, "In order that the poor people may have coal at a uniform rate we will drive out all competition." And they did. And now they can jockey up the price just as they take the notion.

Later on the New York Sugar Refining Company said: "In order that the people may have sugar at a uniform rate we will drive out all competition." And they have been trying to do it, as Mr. Havemeyer testified before the Senate committee only a few days ago. Later on the big butchers of the West began to have enlargement of the heart; they were moved by generous impulses toward the poor people. They said: "In order that the poor people may have meat at a uniform rate, we want to drive out all competition, so that we may control the market and give them cheap meat." They drove out competition, and now the President and the Attorney-General are trying to stop them from charging exhorbitant rates to these same poor people. Beware of the Greeks bearing gifts; beware of the magnanimous promises on the part of these monopolies; beware of any class of people who are trying to screw more money out of the poor. I understand that Mr. John R. McLean is a large stockholder in this corporation and president of it. I am informed he is a very rich man, but he probably would like a little more, in order that he may pay the expenses, the legitimate expenses, of another campaign out in Ohio. But I do not want to be partisan in this speech, because when it comes to making money Republicans and Democrats are alike and politics do not count.

Mr. SHATTUC. You do not believe in trusts——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

Mr. STEWART of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SHATTUC. If you do not believe in trusts, if you consolidate these two trusts, won't you get rid of one? [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes; what is the point of that?

Mr. NORTON. You are eliminating one trust. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. That may seem funny, but it is not very funny to the people of the District, if you are permitted to increase this company's capitalization fivefold. If you give this stock a certificate of character so that the holders may go out and sell it at par, the purchasers will come before this Congress in years to come and say the price of gas must be kept up in order that they may receive a fair dividend on their holdings. That will be no joke, for generations to come, if this proposition goes through.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You spoke of John R. McLean a moment ago being behind this matter, and that it is a monopoly, and you are denouncing it here. The Democrats over there have been doing the same thing, have they not?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes. But I want to say this is not a party question. When it comes to making money, Republicans and Democrats join hands to screw and press a little more out of the blood and tears of the people.

Mr. JENKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Has Mr. McLean approached the gentleman from New York on this question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. No. I have never seen the gentleman in my life.

Mr. JENKINS. Do you know whether he has approached the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES]?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I can say to the gentleman that he has not, and neither has any other man that ever lived to do a wrong.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I do not know anything about approaching the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. McLean is but one stockholder among a thousand.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am not criticising Mr. McLean any more than the others. I say that Republicans and Democrats and Prohibitionists and Mugwumps, when it comes to making money, join hands to screw up prices and wring money out of the people.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. If I understand the gentleman from New York, his statement is that Republicans, Democrats, Mugwumps, and Prohibitionists are frauds.

Mr. DRISCOLL. No; you do not. I say when it comes to making money, when they attempt to make more money under cover of law out of a public utility, then they are frauds, if you call that fraud.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman from New York yield to a further question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. To what party does the gentleman from New York belong?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am here as a Republican with a large majority.

Mr. JENKINS. I understand you to say that all Republicans are frauds.

Mr. DRISCOLL. No; I do not. I say when it comes to making money—to screwing money out of people by monopoly or by protection of law—there is no difference between Democrats and Republicans. Human nature is alike in that respect.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman from New York, then, is screwing money out of the people all the time, is he?

Mr. DRISCOLL. No; I am not.

Mr. JENKINS. Only a part of the time? [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. No; and I am against this bill because you want to screw several millions out of the people and put it into the pockets of this great monopoly. Let me say one word here before I close. I want to call the attention of my friends from Illinois to the fact that they had a Republican convention out there the other day, and they passed resolutions against trusts and made speeches against trusts. Speeches against trusts now are keynote speeches. No man can go out from this hall and accept a nomination, either Republican or Democrat, without talking against trusts which they call keynote speeches, and the Republican platform of Illinois because it denounced trusts is a keynote platform. I do not know how any Republican from Illinois can after reading the platform of his State vote for this bill. I do not know whether the gentleman from Maryland, who was talking for the bill a few moments ago, can go over across the border and talk against trusts in his district. If he wants to be sincere, let him vote against it. If he votes for it, he will have a hard time making the people believe he is sincere when he is railing against trusts and combinations and monopolies next fall.

And what I say to him I wish to apply to every man on either side of the main aisle of this House. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], who is chairman of this District of Columbia Committee, and also chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee, that if he stands here against this bill and hits it hard, he will accomplish more, and it will be a better document for circulation next fall, for his party, than all the literature he can send out if he votes for and stands by this bill here. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], to whom the gentleman from New York has recently referred, is absent from this House on account of sickness. He never does anything for political effect. He does just exactly what he thinks is right, and he is standing for this bill because he knows it is right.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I may certainly give my opinion of his attitude in this particular case. I am not impugning his motives.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman from Wisconsin you refer to is not a demagogue.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am simply talking about this bill. It is wrong, and on its face it is an outrage.

There are some gentlemen who propose to amend this bill. It is apparent it can not go through as it is. Every man who loves fair play, every man who insists that another man shall get a dollar's worth of any sort of product for a dollar, will be against this bill. Now, it is proposed to amend it. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] will not offer his amendment. I hope no other gentleman will offer any amendment. I hope this bill will be killed, because I believe that every man here who is against trusts and combinations of this kind will hit this bill and hit it hard. Then let this company come forward with its record. Let it show where it has made its money; let it show how much surplus it has; let it disclose all the facts, and this Congress in the future will be able to determine what it shall be capitalized at. If this amendment comes up, let it be killed now, and let us not give up the jurisdiction of this Congress over this company and its affairs. Let us retain in the hands of Congress this jurisdiction, so that in the future we may regulate the price of gas and regulate the capitalization of this company. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have but little to say as to why this bill should not become a law. Members of the committee have very ably stated their objection to the bill, and there is no reason why I should take part in the debate except that I want to put on record my protest against this class of legislation. I have no objection to these two companies consolidating. It seems that one company was organized in Georgetown when it was a separate political organization from Washington, and the other company in Washington, many years ago. Washington and Georgetown are now the same city, and if it is more convenient for the stockholders, who I understand own the two companies together, to have them under one management, I see no objection to that. There is a law now on the statute books that authorizes them to make that consolidation, so that, so far as that is concerned, there is no necessity for further consideration by this Congress.

But my objection to the bill goes to the other question, and that is the question of authorizing these companies, under a bill for the consolidation of the two companies, to increase their capital stock $11,000,000. So far as private corporations are concerned, corporations not acting in a public capacity, it is no concern of mine, no concern of yours, and no concern of the people whom we represent how much capitalization they have. It is of little importance to us whether a furnace company manufacturing pig iron for sale has a capitalization of a hundred thousand dollars or a million dollars, because that makes the product of the furnace no higher and no cheaper. It affects the price in no way. That is one class of corporations doing business in this country.

There is another class of corporations occupying a quasi-public position. Railroad companies, telegraph and telephone companies, gas companies, and water companies belong to this latter class. In these companies the stockholders are not the only ones interested. They serve the public. They perform a public duty. The public are required to pay for that service, and the question of how much money the public must pay depends to a certain extent on the amount of the capitalization of those companies. Therefore when you come to a company such as this, a company that has a public duty to perform, a company that sells its product to the people, a company in which every citizen of the District is interested, it is our duty as legislators to consider carefully the amount of capitalization of the company and know whether or not the people whom that company served are to be taxed to pay the dividends on a fair capitalization of the capital stock or on watered stock. Now, what is the history of this company? I have no objection to the people who have money invested in this company receiving a fair and honest return on the money invested.

They have subserved a public need by investing their money in a public enterprise serving the people of this town, and as long as that service is rendered legitimately and properly they should be protected and fostered, but when they ask the people of the city of Washington to pay them unjust and undue dividends on the capitalization of their company, then they are exceeding their legitimate powers and taking that from the people of the District that they are not entitled to receive from them. That is the whole proposition before us.

Now, what is the history of this company? I find that in the year 1848, over fifty years ago, this company was organized with an authorized capitalization of $50,000; that there was only $42,000 actually paid in, and the balance of the capital stock was water up to $50,000. They started out in the very inception of the company by watering their stock, and giving a money bonus to the stockholders, and to receive dividends on that from the people of the District of Columbia. Of course, when the town was small and the consumers were few the company did not make very much money and did not receive a large amount of dividends. But I find from the very able report made by the gentleman who makes the minority report in this case that in the year 1874 this company paid a dividend of 55 per cent to its stockholders; serving a public interest and yet gathered from the people of this District enough money to pay its stockholders 55 per cent on its capital stock.

In 1876 they paid 65 per cent; in 1878 they paid 15 per cent; in 1879 and in 1880 they paid the same per cent, and in the report made at the time when Mr. Randall was Speaker of the House of Representatives they admitted that for thirty-one years they had paid an average to their stockholders of 16¼ per cent, besides the betterments that they had paid for. In 1881 they paid 10 per cent; in 1882 they paid 10 per cent; in 1884 they paid 50 per cent dividend; in 1885 they paid 12½ per cent dividend, and in addition to that they reported in 1896 to the chairman of the District Committee that for that year they had paid 33 per cent dividend on their capital stock.

Mr. COWHERD. That was a statement in the minority report, which was made by estimating the stock at $2,000,000. As a matter of fact, they paid 30 per cent and 6 per cent besides.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the gentleman for the correction, and that only carries out my statement. Instead of 33 per cent, it seems they paid 30 per cent and then 6 per cent on top of that. So the result is that here this company has been in existence for over fifty years and at no time have they paid less than 10 per cent dividends to their stockholders, and on several occasions they have paid as much as 50 per cent, and many times over 25 per cent. Now, it does not appear from any report we have here that they ever called on their stockholders for a single additional dollar of subscription of capital stock since they were incorporated. The entire expansion of the plant, the building of the plant, increasing the piping necessary, has all come from the profits they have collected from the sale of gas to the people of the District of Columbia. They have made it out of the people who have bought gas in the city, and with the returns of the dividends they have received they have increased their capital stock without putting in a single dollar out of their pockets over the $42,000 that they originally invested until it has increased to $2,750,000 to-day.

Now, that is what they have already increased this capital to; and what do they propose in this bill? They propose, because they can pay a dividend on $13,750,000, to increase the capital stock of the company to their dividend-earning capacity. Now, what do they acquire their dividend-earning capacity from? Does it belong to this company? Is it because this property that pays this dividend belongs to the gas company of Washington? If it does, why, then, naturally they might be entitled to increase their capital stock. What it pays this dividend on is the franchise, or the right to sell gas to the people of this city. That is what gives value to the property of this company, and that alone gives value to it.

Mr. JENKINS. With the permission of the gentleman, I will move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection. I will yield for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HASKINS, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13405 and had come to no resolution thereon.

FOR THE RELIEF OF CITIZENS OF THE WEST INDIES.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 5736) for the relief of the citizens of the West Indies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, by instruction of the Committee on Appropriations, calls up the bill S. 5736.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that the committee had arisen to transact business. I understood it was merely an informal matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the committee rose for the purpose of transacting business. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be purchased such provisions, clothing, medicines, and other necessary articles as he shall deem advisable, and tender the same in the name of the Government of the United States to that of France for the relief of the citizens who have suffered by the late earthquake and eruption in the islands of the French West Indies.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into operation this act.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War is authorized to use necessary steamers and vessels belonging to the Government to carry into effect the purpose of this act.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the report of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. HEMENWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred Senate bill 5736, for the relief of citizens of the French West Indies, having considered the same, report it back herewith, and recommend its passage amended as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"To enable the President of the United States to procure and distribute among the suffering and destitute people of the islands of the French West Indies such provisions, clothing, medicines, and other necessary articles, and to take such other steps as he shall deem advisable for the purpose of rescuing and succoring the people who are in peril and threatened with starvation, the sum of $200,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"In the execution of this act the President is requested to ask and obtain the approval of the French Government, and he is hereby authorized to employ any vessels of the United States Navy and to charter and employ any other suitable steamship or vessel."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this comes up by unanimous consent, does it not?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to state that I am opposed to this bill and expect to vote against it. If the gentleman from Indiana will ask for consideration at the proper time, I will not object, but I think it ought to be discussed. It can not be discussed in the midst of a speech in relation to another matter, and I therefore ask the gentleman if he will not withdraw the request for the consideration of the bill for the present?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say if we are to tender this aid at all, it must be done promptly. These people are suffering, and they must be rescued promptly if rescued at all. While the gentleman from Alabama and others are discussing the bill before the Committee of the Whole, these people may be dying. If there is any reason why this bill tendering this aid should pass at all, it should be passed at once. I see no reason why it should not be discussed at this time if it needs to be discussed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Perhaps the gentleman from Indiana sees no reason why it should not be discussed, but I see reasons why I desire to state why the bill should not be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is open now to a full discussion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the House desires me to state my reasons why I do not think it is proper to pass the bill, I will state them now. I desire to vote against it. If it is a unanimous report by the committee of the House and the gentleman from Indiana will state that we shall dispense with the consideration of the bill before the committee for the time and will give an opportunity for discussing this, I am ready to give my reasons now.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is what will be done if the bill is considered by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama desires to know if this is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Indiana says that he will yield the floor for a reasonable debate on this bill. I will state that I do not object, although I expect to vote against it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House briefly that the amendment increases the amount from one to two hundred thousand dollars. In view of the President's message recommending $500,000, the Committee on Appropriations have learned that very liberal contributions are being made by people in the United States; in fact, I have just been handed a letter by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. ALLEN] from J. H. Hamlin & Co., of Portland, Me., stating that they have wired a contribution of $500. We find that liberal contributions are being made in other cities of the United States.

In view of that fact, we thought an appropriation of $200,000 would be sufficient, and it is sufficient, no doubt, to relieve present distress. If it is found necessary, Congress can increase the amount later on; but what they want now is prompt action. The other change we make is that the vessels of the Navy are made available. The Senate resolution permitted the Secretary of War to use such transports as he had. We find that the Secretary of War has no transports on the Atlantic side that can be used, and so we give the President the authority to use vessels of the Navy in carrying out the provisions of the bill. I think it is proper that we should report the bill at this time, because delay is dangerous and this matter ought to be promptly passed. The Secretary of State has received the following telegram:

FORT DE FRANCE, May 11, 1902. (Received 10.05 p. m.)

SECRETARY OF STATE, Washington:

Disaster complete. City wiped out. Consul Prentis and family dead. Governor says 30,000 dead, 50,000 homeless, hungry. Ask Red Cross codfish, flour, beans, rice, salt meats, biscuits, quick as possible. Visit of war vessels valuable.

AYMÉ, Consul, Martinique.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] yield to me for a question before the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] proceeds?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has yielded to the gentleman from Alabama, who has been recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last, when this bill came from the Senate, it was proposed that it should be taken up at once and considered by the House without going through the usual channels of consideration. I insisted that before action was taken by the House the bill should go to the Committee on Appropriations, where the matter could be investigated. I think such a course is proper with all propositions of this kind.

My objection at that time was not merely because I was opposed to the bill, but because I thought the usual course should be pursued under the circumstances. This morning the Committee on Appropriations have brought in a bill, agreed to unanimously by the Republican and Democratic members of that committee, declaring that, in the judgment of the committee, this appropriation should be made. I do not think it wise or expedient or proper to pass this class of legislation; but under the existing circumstances in this case, although I know my single objection might kill the bill, I am not willing to stand in the way of legislation and say that I must determine the question, not my colleagues on the floor of this House. Therefore I have not renewed my objection to the bill. But I wish to state why I intend to vote against it.

There is no man on the floor of this House who has more sympathy for those who are in suffering and distress than I have. I doubt whether there is a man within the sound of my voice whose heart does not go out in sympathy toward those poor suffering people. But there are thousands of suffering people throughout this world with whom we sympathize to-day and will in the future. We stand not here, my colleagues, to legislate on our sympathy or the impulse of our heartstrings. We stand here as the trustees of a great people, a generous people, a kind people, an impulsive people when distress stares them in the face. But because our constituency may open their hearts and yield to their impulses and be guided by that great, that divine principle of kind feeling and charity toward those who are in suffering and distress, does it mean that you and I, as the trustees of those people, should be reckless in our guardianship of the trust that has been delegated to us and left in our hands to administer? I think not.

Here are a people to the south of us, 1,600 miles from the coast of Florida, who have met with a fearful calamity. They are subjects of the Republic of France—a great nation, a powerful nation, a nation of wealth, a nation whose proud boast is that it has always taken care of its own people and is always able and willing to do so. The island of Martinique, where this great disaster has taken place, is surrounded by other islands belonging to the Republic of France. The public dispatches tell us to-day that there are vessels of that nation in that vicinity and that the French Chamber of Commerce has appropriated $100,000, and has ordered those vessels to succor the distressed. The French nation is proceeding with her war vessels and her money to take care of her own people. She has not asked us to interfere in the matter.

If the Republic of France were unable to take care of her citizens, if she were in distress and needed our help, it might be another matter. But, my fellow-citizens, I say that we owe a duty to our own people, a higher duty than we owe to the people of France. Our own citizens to-day are raising funds from their own pockets to contribute aid to our suffering neighbors. It is right, it is generous, it is just that they should do so. It would be right and generous and just for you and me to go into our own pockets and take out our own money and send it to the needy and suffering citizens of France. We may be generous with our own money, but I ask you what right have we to be generous with the money of our constituencies to help a foreign people? I know of none.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not know whether the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] voted to relieve the reconcentrados in Cuba when that proposition was before the House, or whether he voted for the relief of the Galveston sufferers when that measure was pending here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think I did.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to know what the gentleman's idea is as to how far the brotherhood of man extends—whether in his opinion it is limited by territorial or international lines?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend, I will say that the brotherhood of man, when the interests of man as an individual are involved, extends to the circumference of the universe; but when it is a government that is involved, when it is a public trust that is to be administered, a trust placed in our hands that we must administer with justice to our own people, it does not extend beyond the powers that have been granted to us.

Mr. KLEBERG. How is it possible for the American people to act in this emergency except through their Government and their chosen representatives here?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, sir, the American people are acting to-day. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] has stated that the American people, not the American Government, are raising subscriptions to aid those sufferers in a foreign land, and that can be properly and generously done, and if necessary, the aid thus contributed can be sent to them through our consular officers.

Mr. KLEBERG. How can the provisions or other necessary succor be sent to them except by the Government—in ships of the Government?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When Congress, some years ago, provided (not with my vote) for sending relief to the starving people of India, the citizens contributing relief hired vessels, and the Government itself hired vessels, for sending that relief. That is what is being done now.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. McDERMOTT. There are probably now among the 70,000,000 people of the United States two or three million who are too mean to contribute. Is there any other way of making them contribute except by taking it out of the National Treasury? [Laughter.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, my friend, I have no desire to make that man by force of law contribute that is too mean to sympathize and feel sorrow for suffering humanity about him when he can go down in his own pocket and pay for it, and I say that if the men on the floor of this House who want to show their sympathy for a suffering people will go down in their own pockets and foot the bill that they will be properly expressing the sympathy they have in this matter instead of taking the money out of the pockets of their constituents to pay the bill, whether their constituents like it or not.

Now, I say, in the next place, that I do not believe that this is a dignified course for a great nation like this to pursue. I think it would have been very proper and very right for the President of the United States, immediately on hearing of the disaster at Martinique, to have telegraphed the American ambassador at Paris to express to the President of the French Republic our sincere sympathy in the great calamity that had happened to his people. Nay, I would go further than that. If our war vessels were lying off that coast and it was necessary to have ships to save the lives of those people and get them away from that burning lava, I would not have asked Congress, but I would have ordered the vessels in there to take them off that day and hour. That would have been proper and that would have been a case of emergency; but when you say that we must express our sympathy to those people by going into the pocket of somebody else and making them pay for our sympathy I can not say that I believe that that is the duty of a member of this House.

Mr. JENKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if the gentleman from Alabama will yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. JENKINS. I understand the gentleman from Alabama predicates his objection on general principles, and not on constitutional grounds.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, well, I will say that I do not think that the Government has that power, but I am not arguing a constitutional question here.

Mr. JENKINS. Well, I want to know what benefit it would be to those unfortunate people for the President of the United States to telegraph his condolence.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, it would not be any benefit to the unfortunate people, but it would be a proper expression to the Republic of France of our sympathy. But why can not the French Republic take care of its own people? It is proceeding to do so. It has not asked us to do so.

Mr. JENKINS. Does not the gentleman from Alabama understand that this is the greatest and foremost nation in the world and that we propose to be foremost on all of these great questions, and that we have got lots of money and it is not coming out of the pockets of the poor people that the gentleman from Alabama represents? The people of the United States are ready and willing to do their duty on great occasions of this kind without reference to the Constitution or the view of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will not make a speech in my time, I will be very much obliged.

Mr. JENKINS. I will not make a speech in the gentleman's time; but this is a matter of immediate importance. If we propose to help those unfortunate people, we must do it now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thank the gentleman for his speech in the belly of mine, but I did not yield for that purpose.

Mr. HILDEBRANT. That is the best part of the speech.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What I say is that this is not the proper way for us to take care of other people. I know there are hundreds of men in this House—perhaps hundreds are too many, but there are many men in this House—able gentlemen, honest men, men of large hearts and conscience, men that believe just as does the gentleman from Wisconsin, that we are a great nation and that we have great power to raise money by taxation; that we have an overflowing Treasury, and that we ought to distribute it to all mankind, but I do not believe that I was elected here for that purpose. I do not expect to prevent the passage of this bill, but in my own humble capacity I desire to say that I do not believe it is right to express our sympathy or our sorrow with the money of our constituents, and I do not think it is a dignified course for this Government as a government to pursue.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rose merely to demand the yeas and nays upon the main question and not upon the amendment.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. McRAE. I want only a couple of minutes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, when calamity comes down soul rises up. The hearts of our people have been deeply touched by the awful disaster that has befallen the people of this unfortunate island. In the presence of such great desolation we should not stop to draw nice constitutional distinctions. We have precedents, and that is enough for me. I have respect for those who have misgivings as to the power of the Government to grant such aid, and I shall have no quarrel with them, but I am glad that I can feel in my own consciousness that my Government has the disposition and power to act in an emergency like this, and can extend not only its sympathy, but substantial relief to the sufferers of a sister Republic. [Loud applause.] I would like to see this resolution pass unanimously, but if it can not be my pleasure to see that, I hope at least that it will pass promptly and let these poor, unfortunate people who are suffering as no people have within the life of any man now living receive the benefit of our beneficence.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, this is the unanimous action of the Committee on Appropriations. It is the custom of this country, and has been since the day that we have had a Republic, to do just this thing, and I should hate to see this country turn back upon its record and fail to meet the wants of suffering humanity, whether in the island of Martinique or whether in the uttermost parts of the earth, wherever it may be, and I hope this House will, without a dissenting voice, vote for this appropriation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an amendment to make it $500,000, in accordance with the request of the President?

Mr. HEMENWAY. This is the unanimous action of the Committee on Appropriations, and I can not yield for that purpose. I hope there will be no further discussion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BALL of Texas. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the request. We do not want any politics in this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they can be counted.

Thirty members having risen,

The SPEAKER. Does anyone demand the other side?

Mr. JENKINS. I demand the other side, Mr. Speaker.

The other side being taken, 103 members rose in opposition to the demand.

The SPEAKER. Thirty members, a sufficient number, having risen, the yeas and nays are ordered. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 197, nays 9, answered "present" 11, not voting 134, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in his place and watching when his name was called?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. And did not hear? Call the name of the gentleman from Virginia.

The name of Mr. JONES of Virginia was called, and he voted "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Clerk read my name as being paired with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FLETCHER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is paired, as the Chair is informed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is a mistake. That pair does not apply, as I understand it, to anything except the admission of the Territories.

The SPEAKER. The pair is withdrawn on the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I want to vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is announced that I am paired with Mr. SNOOK. It is a mistake.

The SPEAKER. What was the statement of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I say that my understanding is that my pair does not apply to this question, and I vote "yea."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am in exactly the same fix. My pair with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK] does not apply to this vote. I voted "yea."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama voted "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I voted "yea."

Mr. GROSVENOR. I voted "yea." I stated that it was announced at the desk that I was paired with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK].

The SPEAKER. The pair is withdrawn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I voted "yea."

The SPEAKER. The Chair is so advised.

Mr. CROMER. Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. ZENOR, but not on this question. I voted "yea."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire his pair withdrawn?

Mr. CROMER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The pair will be withdrawn.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HEMENWAY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WASHINGTON AND GEORGETOWN GASLIGHT COMPANIES.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 13405) authorizing the Washington Gaslight Company to purchase the Georgetown Gaslight Company, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed at half past 4.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H. R. 13405, and pending that, asks that general debate be closed at half past 4. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that will not interfere with my having a part of the time.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman from Alabama is to have ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. HASKINS in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, some hour or more ago I was engaged in discussing a proposition in reference to gas. In the meantime we have taken several voyages across the ocean, and I am not sure whether I can pick up the broken remarks at the point where I left off or not.

I want to say in conclusion, in the very few minutes that I have, that I believe the reason why we ought to vote against this bill and the vicious part of this bill, is the increase of the $11,000,000 worth of capital stock that goes into the pockets of the owners of this gas company. I have already pointed out the enormous dividends that have been received by these stockholders, which show that they have increased the plant, as the city grew, without any cost to them. They have made money out of it, until they claim that this stock is able to pay a dividend not on $2,750,000 capitalization, the amount it was originally capitalized at, but on $13,750,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand the amount of money that the company has actually spent in paying for the present plant and the improvements to be about $5,000,000. Will the gentleman from Alabama vote for an amendment and for the bill afterwards if the amendment was adopted, fixing the capital stock at $5,000,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state that if the stockholders of this company have paid out and invested $5,000,000 and have got that as representing their money in this corporation, I should be willing to capitalize it at that amount. But if the capitalization and the value of this property instead of depending on the money that these stockholders have put into it depends on the value of this franchise, and on account of the franchise it makes it worth $5,000,000, I would not vote for it. In other words, I do not believe that we have any right to capitalize a franchise for the benefit of the gas stockholders, because I believe that the franchise belongs to the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My question did not involve the capitalization of the franchise; it is the cost of the improvements and the original work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it has been invested by the stockholders, I have no objection to their having a proper capitalization of the amount of money they have actually invested, and more than that, I believe they ought to receive a proper interest on that investment. I believe that the price of gas ought to be fixed so that they can receive a proper interest on that investment. But what I am complaining of is that without the actual investment of money being represented they are seeking to water this capital stock, and then receive dividends on it in place of the smaller capitalization. They want to do that so that in the future years it will be impossible for Congress to cut down the price of gas in the District of Columbia, because they will say that it is necessary for us to charge a dollar a thousand for gas in order for us to pay a fair dividend on the capital that has been issued by the Congress itself to these stockholders, and Congress in the future days will be estopped from saying that it has the right to reduce the price of gas for the people of the District of Columbia.

Now, that is the whole case in a nutshell. It is merely an effort on the part of the stockholders to put the capitalization of this company at a point where under the law and decisions of the court it will be beyond the power of Congress in the future to reduce the price of gas to the people of this District, and I am opposed to this bill for that reason. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I regret very much that the chairman of this committee, who has had this matter in immediate and close consideration for years, is not able on account of his health to be present. If it was possible, he would be here in person defending this bill. He has asked me, on account of his inability to be present, to present a few ideas in support of this bill. I regret and have been surprised at the wild and exaggerated statements that have been made here upon this floor in opposition to this bill. It seems to me that whenever a corporation presents itself here on any question it gives every gentleman a desire to make himself popular with his people and to meet and oppose the progress of the pending measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. JENKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that the amount of money actually invested in this original plant and its subsequent extension and improvements is about $5,000,000, leaving the franchise out of the question. Why not, then, in the bill fix the amount of capitalization at $5,000,000?

Mr. JENKINS. I will say to the gentleman that there are several gentlemen who desire to offer an amendment, and if the gentleman from Mississippi desires, there will be no objection as far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is what I wanted to know, whether it would be objected to by the committee.

Mr. JENKINS. Not in the least. Now, let me call attention to the facts in this case, so that every gentleman who desires to represent his constituents honestly and fairly on this floor can act.

Now, there are two gaslight companies within the jurisdiction of Congress. One is the Washington Gaslight Company, with a capitalization of 130,000 shares, the face value of which is $20 a share, the total amount being $2,600,000. Then there is the Georgetown Gas Company, with a capitalization of 6,000 shares, the face value of which is $25 a share, and with a total capitalization of $150,000. Now, those two companies simply come here to Congress to ask permission to consolidate. That is the only favor they need ask from Congress. Every other matter provided for in this bill could be obtained under the general law without coming to Congress. They have repeatedly said that they did not propose to make a single move here, so far as they were concerned, without the approval of Congress, because they were so much under the direction of Congress. They simply propose in their bill that the total capitalization shall not exceed 130,000 shares and that the value of their property shall be ascertained in any way which may be satisfactory to Congress.

It does not make any difference what proposition is made here for the purpose of determining the value of these properties. There is no gentleman on the committee—representing the majority of the committee or representing the gentlemen in the company—who will oppose any measure looking to a fair valuation.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that every possible opportunity has been presented here for any gentleman who is opposed to corporations to make a direct attack upon this institution. It is true that it started in here years and years ago under adverse circumstances. I want to know why it is that because a number of gentlemen see fit to pool their earnings and enter into an enterprise that is of value to the public they should be antagonized by Representatives in Congress or in State legislatures.

These gentlemen have put in their money in good faith; they put it in for the purpose of investment, not for the purpose of losing money. And they have added to the value of the property of this country and this city. They have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in the interest of labor. They have spent over $25,000 a mile for as many miles of street improvement in this city. Yet my friend from Missouri says that it costs only $4,000 a mile to do this work. There are many streets in this city that require two pipes, one on each side, and I am assured, within a few hours, by honorable and reputable gentlemen representing that company that it cost them $25,000 a mile in the city of Washington to put in their improvements.

There is not a single gas consumer in the city of Washington, there is not a single stockholder of either of these companies who has come before Congress and asked any politician to help them or to protest that their interests are at stake or in danger—not a single man. And when they talk here about this matter having been "rushed" through the committee they know they are perpetrating a falsehood upon this House; and I am prepared to deny it.

The gentleman from Missouri has fairly and honestly stated this matter—that this bill has been pending before this committee for upward of three years. Every gentleman here has been well fortified with information on this subject. How is it with the gentleman from New York, who says he has been denied the privilege of exploiting himself on this bill? He has been furnished with every single piece of information that is absolutely inaccurate and absolutely false, so far as the facts are concerned. Every gentleman on this committee who has been a member of it for years has given this question most earnest consideration, and these members have testified their approval of this bill by signing the report. Not content to shield themselves behind the action of the chairman of the committee, they have individually signed the report, because, Mr. Chairman, this measure is for the interest of every gas consumer in the district.

The people of Georgetown have been before us unanimously and earnestly asking us for the passage of this bill. I never saw a single director of this company. I would not know Mr. McLean if I met him on the street. When gentlemen say they have been importuned by gentleman representing this company it is because of their weakness, not because of their strength in this House. No man has approached me since this matter has been pending in the committee. When it was presented to me I realized the situation in a moment.

There are two gas companies—one in Washington and one in Georgetown. They say, "Let us consolidate and we will reduce the price of gas in Georgetown 25 cents per thousand feet; we will put Georgetown in this respect on an equality with the people of Washington, who are paying $1 per thousand feet."

Five years ago Congress investigated this question very carefully and with great deliberation. We compared the price of gas in Washington with the price in every other place in the United States and came to the conclusion that the price here should be reduced, and it was reduced to $1 per thousand feet, with a requirement of 25 candlepower.

And here is a gentleman from Missouri standing here to-day opposing this measure when he knows very well that he was the mayor of Kansas City when this question was under consideration and that we are giving the people of Washington to-day a better quality of gas at a less rate than any other place in the United States. No gentleman on this floor can deny that.

Mr. COWHERD rose.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield, of course, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD].

Mr. COWHERD. I understood the gentleman to say something in regard to me——

Mr. JENKINS. No; I am not saying anything with reference to the gentleman from Missouri. He must not be too sensitive. I am speaking of the price of gas in his place. I say the people there are receiving a poorer quality of gas and are paying a higher rate than the people here in the District of Columbia. It is conceded by every gentleman on this floor—it is shown by every fact that has been presented to us—that the price of gas in Washington is cheaper and the quality better than in any place in the United States.

And I want to know why gentlemen should be making a direct attack upon this institution. As I have said, I do not know a single officer of the company. No man has approached me, because he knew it would not be safe for him to do so. The proposition comes up here before us as a business proposition. These companies say, "Allow us to consolidate these two companies, and we will give the people of Georgetown gas for 25 cents a thousand less than they are paying now."

We will put them on an equality with the people of Washington. The people of Washington had this matter carefully and fully investigated by a committee of this Congress and they advised and recommended, and this Congress approved of it, a gradual reduction in the price of gas, and that took place here until they have got to-day dollar gas, cheaper than any other place in the United States, and 25 candlepower, while gentlemen here know they are representing a constituency that is charging $1.60 for 16-candlepower gas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that it is popular to-day to attack these institutions, but I am governed only by a business proposition. They say it was hurried through the committee. Those gentlemen know they are not stating the facts. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], who has been an honored and respected member of this committee for years, says this proposition has been pending before this committee for over four years.

Mr. PAYNE. He said two years.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is talking about misrepresentations. I know the gentleman would not misrepresent anything himself, and I do not think he would charge anyone else with misrepresentation, unless he was justified. I would like to ask him if it is not a fact that I pleaded with that committee to put off the report of this bill until Mr. COWHERD should come back from Kansas City, because he is a practical man, and did not the gentleman vote it down?

Mr. JENKINS. Let me answer that, and let this House understand it and the country understand it. My friend from Missouri wanted to go home to secure his election, and the committee was asked to postpone a matter of great importance to give him an opportunity to come back here, and every Republican in this Congress is perfectly willing to indorse him; that if a man has got to come from Kansas City, they want Mr. COWHERD and no one else; but the gentleman proposed to postpone business and I had only one vote, like my friend the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. It made no difference to me. It is well known that the chairman of that committee was sick. He wanted to make a report.

This matter has been pending for four years before the committee, and when they undertake to say it was hurried through the committee they do not want to stand up here in the face and eyes of my statement and oppose that statement. They know there was nothing rushed through that committee. It was carefully considered. Every man on that committee knew all about it, and my friend from Missouri and my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] will join me in saying that for three months they have stayed out of church and Sunday school to hunt up villainous objections to this proposition, that they ought not to find fault with, or less fault with, because we have taken this matter up and asked for prompt consideration.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, let me make just this suggestion. If there is anything on earth that would justify a man in staying away from Sunday school and church it would be to fight such a bill as this. [Prolonged laughter.]

Mr. JENKINS. I know my friend abhors a corporation.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no.

Mr. JENKINS. And I appreciate it. I know he is absolutely afraid of everything that has corporate qualities, but yet when I invited him in a previous Congress to put these corporations under his control, he voted against it. He is only consistent when he is voting for the Methodist Church to rob the Treasury of the United States. [Prolonged laughter.] The people of this District have no interest in this question. When the people of this District come up here, Mr. Chairman, and ask that we reduce the price of gas, I will be with them, as I have always been with them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What I want to know is this: In the report of the minority they declare this proposition is to increase the capital stock of the consolidated company from $2,750,000 to $13,750,000, an increase of $11,000,000, unrepresented by a single additional dollar of cash or property. Is that true?

Mr. JENKINS. If my friend had been in this House he would have heard all of these things refuted some time ago. I have not time to refute them to-day. Everybody knows there is not an element of truth in that statement, simply because this corporation says that they are willing that this House should adopt any measure that will fix the capitalization at the value of their property, and we want to yield to the gentleman from Maine for the purpose of offering an amendment which we will not object to, as to fixing the capitalization at anything relative to the value of that property.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the enacting clause.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to strike out the enacting clause. I believe it is in order after the reading of the enacting clause.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that motion is in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the section should be first read.

Mr. COWHERD. I thought it was in order after the reading of the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The enacting clause is a part of the first section. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order that illuminating gas may be furnished to the citizens of the District of Columbia at a uniform rate, the Washington Gaslight Company, upon the assent of a majority in value of the stockholders, is hereby authorized to contract for, purchase, own, hold, and enjoy the whole or any part of the capital stock of the Georgetown Gaslight Company, or is hereby authorized to contract to purchase, or purchase, the property, including plant, distributing plant, rights, effects, and franchises of the Georgetown Gaslight Company, and upon payment and delivery of the consideration agreed upon the same may be owned, held, and enjoyed by the Washington Gaslight Company as fully and entirely as the same were held and enjoyed by the Georgetown Gaslight Company, and shall be managed and controlled by the board of directors of the Washington Gaslight Company; and each such company is hereby empowered to enter into such contract of sale, or sale, through its board of directors, if the said contract of sale, or sale, has received the approval of a majority in value of the stockholders of said companies; and to enable the Washington Gaslight Company to pay for the stock or the purchase of the Georgetown Gaslight Company it is hereby authorized to issue at par a sufficient amount of its capital stock, which amount of stock so issued may equal in par value, but shall not exceed in par value, the actual value of the capital stock of the said Georgetown Gaslight Company, or of so much as may be purchased, such actual value to be determined by the market price thereof at the date of the enactment of this bill: And provided further, That no action or proceeding to which the Georgetown Gaslight Company may be a party shall thereby abate, but the same may be continued against said company unless the court in which said action may be pending shall order the said Washington Gaslight Company to be substituted as party thereto.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause, and I want to say to the House that I make that motion at this time to test the sense of the House. If the majority of the House agrees with the minority of the committee that this bill should be entirely defeated, this is a quick and easy way to do it. If they do not agree with us, then it gives us an opportunity to amend it hereafter.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to perfect the bill. Does not that take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Missouri?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that a motion to strike out the enacting clause takes precedence over all other motions.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to be heard on the point of order, to say that the motion to strike out the enacting clause is not in order at this time until the bill has been considered. After the consideration of the bill a motion of that kind would be in order, but at the same time I have no quarrel with my friend from Missouri with reference to testing the House at this time. If the House is of opinion that the enacting clause should be stricken out, I yield to that, but I do not agree to the opinion of the gentleman from Missouri that a motion of that kind is in order at this time.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to ruling on page 472, which perhaps differentiates this motion from an ordinary motion.

A special order having been made in the House that certain procedure should be taken, the ruling here seems to be the special order providing that the bill should be open to amendments in Committee of the Whole, that that special order would prevent a motion to strike out the enacting clause; but if it had been under different circumstances, I presume the motion would have been in order.

Mr. COWHERD. There was no special order in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Connecticut that there was no special order made in this case.

Mr. HILL. "The gentleman from Connecticut" understood that the House in open session voted to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill with a fixed time for general debate, and then to be taken up under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no such order. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] to strike out the enacting clause.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by several members) there were—ayes 99, noes 40.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report to the House its action in striking out the enacting clause of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HASKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13405) authorizing the Washington Gaslight Company to purchase the Georgetown Gaslight Company, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the recommendation of the committee.

The recommendation of the committee was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. COWHERD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ANNA ELIZA ISABELLA VON HEMERT.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 5587) for the relief of Anna Eliza Isabella Von Hemert, and the same was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

COURTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. STEWART. I introduce a joint resolution, and I send to the desk a letter from the Attorney-General showing the necessity for its immediate passage. After the joint resolution is read I shall ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 99) fixing the time when certain provisions of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," shall take effect from and after July 1, 1902, except as otherwise specially provided therein.

Mr. STEWART. Now I ask for the reading of the letter explanatory of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., May 12, 1902.

Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

SIR: In the bill or act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," there is legislation dividing the northern district of the Indian Territory into two districts; also authorizing the appointment of an additional United States marshal, an additional United States attorney, and other officers; also fixing additional places of holding terms of court, etc. It is deemed important that said legislation shall not take effect until July 1, 1902, in order that all necessary appointments may be made before that time and business arranged in accordance with the provisions of said act.

If said act shall be allowed to take effect immediately upon approval, much confusion is likely to result; also much additional expense will be caused thereby, as is more fully explained by the United States marshal for the northern district of the Indian Territory in his letter dated the 9th instant, a copy of which is inclosed herewith.

It is, therefore, considered important that a joint resolution (a draft of which is herewith inclosed) should be passed without delay, in order that it may be approved by the President before the date of the approval of the above-mentioned act.

Respectfully, P. C. KNOX, Attorney-General.

Mr. HOAR. If the act itself——

Mr. STEWART. The joint resolution does not make an appropriation.

Mr. HOAR. If the act does not take effect at a certain time this legislation is unnecessary. If the act will take effect at a certain time by its own terms, how can a joint resolution passed before the act is signed by the President change it? As I understand the letter of the Attorney-General, it is that a pending bill not yet approved will take effect before the 1st of July, 1902, and that will make confusion in the courts, and so on. Therefore he proposes before that act is signed to have another act passed saying it shall not take effect until after the 1st of July, 1902. I do not see how that can be done.

Mr. STEWART. The act as to appropriations does not take effect until the 1st of July, but the act as to other matters, it is supposed, will take effect immediately.

Mr. HOAR. That I understand. Let me repeat, because——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let it be read again.

Mr. STEWART. Let the Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Let me repeat before the joint resolution is read, the Attorney-General complains that a certain act now pending and not yet signed by its terms except as to appropriations will take effect before the 1st of July, 1902, and that will create inconvenience. Now, admit all that, then he proposes to provide by getting through a bill before that act gets through declaring that that act shall not take effect in these particulars until after the 1st of July. If that act means one thing in itself and is to be the last act passed, how can our making a declaration before that time by a bill first passed help it?

Mr. STEWART. I can explain that.

Mr. HOAR. That is what I want to know.

Mr. STEWART. I can explain it, I think, readily. It will be passed right through and go to the President and he will sign the other first and make this the last bill. There is no trouble about it. It can be very easily managed.

Mr. HOAR. The Attorney-General says in his letter he wants this measure hurried through in order that the President may sign it before he signs the other act.

Mr. STEWART. That can be arranged when both bills are presented.

Mr. HOAR. I will not make any objection because I defer to the Senator from Nevada in this matter.

Mr. STEWART. I shall certainly make that suggestion to the Attorney-General.

Mr. HOAR. The mere fact that I am a little puzzled by what my honorable friend says brings me back to his delightful old silver days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let it be read again.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be read.

Mr. HOAR. Let the joint resolution be read, and then let the letter be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. For information I should like to have the letter read.

Mr. HOAR. Let the Attorney-General's letter be read.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to ask a question in connection with the joint resolution. Does the bill in terms provide that the sections to which the joint resolution relates shall take effect immediately?

Mr. STEWART. No; I think not, as to those provisions. However, the Attorney-General thinks that would be the case, because the appropriations are limited by the legislation.

Mr. HOAR. Now, let the letter be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Secretary again read the letter of the Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to ask one question. Does the joint resolution make the provision in the Indian appropriation bill, at the end of the bill, authorizing a new judicial circuit there, take effect on the 1st of July next?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that the letter of the marshal referred to in the letter of the Attorney-General be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
UNITED STATES MARSHAL'S OFFICE,
NORTHERN DISTRICT, INDIAN TERRITORY,
Muskogee, Ind. T., May 9, 1902.

Maj. FRANK STRONG,
General Agent, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MAJOR: I have just wired the Attorney-General that newspaper dispatches report passage of Indian appropriation bill containing provisions affecting the courts in the northern district and suggesting that if such provisions become operative immediately upon approval of the act by the President, such approval should be withheld for ten days to enable our courts to transfer cases, close up the Vinita grand jury, etc., and adjust the business of the district so as to save some thousands of dollars to the Government and avoid much confusion and no little resultant complications. I write you to confirm the telegram and to explain from my point of view the necessity for sending this message, and why I recommend the withholding of the approval of the President for not less than ten days.

Of course, this suggestion and recommendation is based upon the uncertainty at this time existing as to the date when the change in the district will take effect—whether immediately upon approval or on the 1st of July next. If these court provisions of the bill do not go into effect until the 1st of July, there will be plenty of time for our courts and officials to arrange the business. Our district attorney "thinks" the bill will not go into effect until July 1, and Judge Gill "thinks" the bill becomes effective—concerning the courts and division of district—immediately upon approval. I do not "think" either way as I await the instructions of the Department, by which I am solely governed, and invite your attention to the matter as I know that the Department is just as solicitous as possible to see the change made with the least possible confusion of the public business and the saving of all possible expense.

Vinita court opened last Monday morning with a rather heavy grand jury docket. At least 30 important cases—murder, robbery, burglary, larcenies, etc.—properly belong in the courts of the new western district for trial, and are being transferred as rapidly as the indictments are returned into court. Some of them can not be reached before the 15th, and possibly the 17th. The proposed law does not make provision for transfers of cases. For instance, one case before the Vinita court (grand jury) is that of three negroes charged with two murders committed near Wewoka, 178 miles from Vinita. A small number of witnesses only appear before the grand jury. Indictments have been found and defendants served with certified copies of the indictment and list of witnesses. Forty-eight hours must elapse before they can be arraigned. When arraigned they will plead not guilty and the cases—there are two cases against each of these three—will be transferred to Wewoka for trial. In the trial of the cases at least a score of witnesses will be required. All live within 10 miles of Wewoka and more than 180 miles from Vinita. You can see that the saving of expense in mileage will be quite an item. From 20 to 30 cases will be thus transferred from Vinita to Wewoka, Muskogee, and Wagoner for trial.

There are also pending on the dockets of other courts several cases—probably aggregating fifty—which should be transferred from district to district. This can be done under present laws, all the courts being in the one district. But when new law goes into effect and two districts are thus created these transfers would cease, as there is no law authorizing transfers, and the court of appeals has held that criminal cases can not be transferred from one district to another under any condition of plea. The present juries at Vinita are made up of residents of the country within the new western as well as the new northern district. The moment the law is operative these juries must be reorganized and all members residing in new western district be excused from service, or the indictments of the grand jury or verdicts of petit jury will be voidable, if not absolutely void.

As affecting me personally, or rather officially, in the proper discharge of my duties, it is important for me to know whether or not the new law of itself makes me the marshal of the western district without further action by the President, the Department, or myself. Or will it be necessary for me to be reappointed, take a new oath of office, and file a new bond? If the former, will I continue my official work uninterruptedly, or will I need to close my accounts as marshal of the northern district and begin anew as marshal of western district? If required to close my accounts, an exact date should be fixed in advance, as I am daily incurring and paying hundreds of dollars of expense, especially during the session of court, in paying jurors and witnesses. My deputies are daily making arrests and serving process. Their tenure of office and authority as deputies are dependent upon my own standing. A fixed date in advance will enable me to so arrange these matters that while there will be a line or date between the present and new tenure no complications in accounts or interruption of service will result.

I now think I will go to Washington about the middle of next week, or earlier, if possible to leave the district without neglect of more important business. I have ten prisoners for Washington, five for Insane Asylum and five for Reform School, and hope to reach Washington with them on next Wednesday or Thursday.

I have written you hurriedly, but have tried to so present the matter from my point of view as marshal as to show the necessity for an early conclusion as to the date when the new law is effective and the necessity of my being advised as early as possible in the matter of said date.

I will wire you the day I leave for Washington, so you may know whether to write or wire me here or hold instructions until I can reach Washington.

If, as I hope is the case, the new law will not go into effect until the close of the fiscal year, the changes can be made without a particle of disturbance of the business of the district.

Very sincerely, yours,

LEO E. BENNETT,
United States Marshal.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13895) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for action on the amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments shall first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 3, line 12, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the office of the Secretary of Agriculture from $4,240 to $4,960.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Weather Bureau," on page 8, after line 12, to insert:

For the purchase of sites and erection of not less than six buildings for use as Weather Bureau observatories, and for all necessary labor, materials, and expenses; plans and specifications to be prepared, and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and work done under the supervision of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, including the purchase of instruments, furniture, supplies, flagstaffs, and storm-warning towers, to properly equip these stations, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 7, to increase the total appropriation for the maintenance of the Weather Bureau from $1,201,760 to $1,248,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2295.

Mr. BAILEY. Pending that motion, Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, and that inquiry is, What has become of the resolution in relation to special embassies at coronations which is on the President's table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have listened with interest and some surprise to the debate on this bill. It has been more earnest and at times more acrimonious than any debate to which I have ever listened in this Chamber. Although I was here during the exciting period of reconstruction and during the debates on the various questions arising out of the settlement of the war of the rebellion, I have heard nothing to compare with this debate, and I am at a loss to know what has inspired it. There is nothing in the bills of the majority and of the minority to excite animosity or strong language.

The war with Spain was brought on by both parties. The Democratic party, if I remember aright, was most urgent for the war. So far as the war with Spain is concerned, it was the result of the action of both branches of Congress and of the Executive, the Executive following rather than leading. So there can be nothing to excite animosities or criticism growing out of the bringing on of the war. That was a Democratic measure quite as much as it was a Republican measure.

Then came the settlement,

THE TREATY OF PEACE.

That was ratified by a two-thirds majority of the Senate, several Democrats voting for it, and it was about as much a Democratic measure as it was a Republican measure. At all events, it was the measure of the Government. We acquired the islands through the ratification of the treaty. Subsequent to the treaty both parties joined in making appropriations to carry on such operations in the Philippines as were necessary. The ratification of the treaty imposed upon the Executive the duty to take possession of the islands, and to take care of them. It was the duty of the Executive to provide a military government without any action of Congress. That is what has been done in all other cases.

In California, for example, there was no legislation regulating affairs for four years—from 1846 to 1850. Military officers administered the law under the Executive. They formed a State government and proceeded without any action of Congress. There is no question about the authority or the duty of the President to do all this.

For the present status in the Philippines

BOTH PARTIES ARE RESPONSIBLE.

The country is responsible. It is the United States which has acted to bring about the present condition of things. Why should there be any excitement about that? The majority report provides for a temporary government there; it provides for the acquiring of the title to mines; it provides for a currency; it provides for many necessary things in order that the country may have some law under which it may proceed, in order that business may be carried on. I do not hear much criticism of the provisions of the bill for carrying on the government, and so far as holding the Philippines is concerned, the majority and minority are in accord. The difference between the majority and the minority relates to the future.

The second section of the bill proposed as a substitute by the minority reads as follows:

That the United States shall continue to occupy and govern said archipelago until the people thereof have established a government, and until sufficient guaranties have been obtained for the performance of our treaty obligations with Spain and for the safety of those inhabitants who have adhered to the United States, and for the maintenance and protection of all rights which have accrued under the authority thereof.

Both sides are agreed that the Philippines shall be held at present. There is no division on that subject. There need be no excitement about the present occupation. It is thoroughly concurred in. Then the only point made by the minority worth considering is the question of making promises. The minority insist that we should promise the Philippines to do in the future something we are not ready to do now. I do not believe in making promises in advance. I think we have had enough such promises.

I do not believe 5 per cent of the American people are satisfied with

THE PROMISE WE MADE TO CUBA.

I think we ought to have held Cuba. I think we will get it in time, but it will not be the result of the war, as it should have been. I think that promise is going to make us a great deal of trouble, as it has already made us trouble; but we made the promise, and we are going to carry it out in good faith. We are asked to promise these Filipinos that when they have established a form of government, and have given guaranties that they will protect the amigos—those who have been our friends—that they will carry out our treaty obligations with Spain and all other nations, we will give them their independence.

How long will it take us to get those guaranties? Considering the character of the people with whom we have to deal, we know thatit will be a long time before they can establish a government which can perform our treaty obligations with Spain, securing the safety of the inhabitants of the islands who have adhered to the United States and maintained and protected the rights which have accrued under the authority of the United States. These people know nothing about treaty obligations. There are different grades among them. A great many of them are savages. A great many of them are the descendants of pirates, and are engaged in no legitimate business. It will be some time, from the evidence we have, before these people can be trusted to comply with the conditions required by the minority. Will it not be time enough to act when we know that such a stable government has been formed? If we make this promise now there will be a difference of opinion as to when the conditions have been complied with, and the uncertainty may continue for the next fifty years.

It may be wrong to have taken upon ourselves this responsibility. The result of the war may have been unfortunate, but that is not the question.

WE HAVE THE PHILIPPINES.

We can not let them go now, as all agree. We are under obligations to Spain and to the world to see that the rights of person and property are protected. All agree that we can not turn the government over to them now, and we do not know when we can. Nobody can say when a stable government will be established. And now it is proposed to confuse and embarrass the situation by vain promises. The minority proposes to agitate the country on the question of what that promise will be—not what we will do, but what we will tell them we will do. Such an issue seems to me very foolish but not very exciting. Why tell them what we will do under certain conditions when we have not any reasonable hope that those conditions will exist in the present generation.

The enemy with whom we are dealing is a very different man from what many of us suppose. We did not know anything about him until recently. He has a history which is illustrated in his recent conduct. It is not a new history. It is nearly five hundred years old since it began.

The islands were discovered by Magellan, and he was killed at the time of making that discovery. If the Secretary will read what I have marked, I will be obliged to him. It begins on page 12 and ends on page 13 of Comyn's Philippine Islands, which is authentic Spanish history.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WELLINGTON in the chair). If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Archipelago of St. Lazarus, the name originally given to the Philippine Islands, was discovered by Hernando de Magallanes, who left Seville in August, 1519, with five ships, manned by 234 men, and fitted out by orders of Charles V. On reaching the South Sea, by the passage still bearing the name of its discoverer, he had only three vessels left; but with these he proceeded on in quest of the Spice Islands, the chief plea that had given rise to so daring an enterprise. On the day of St. Lazarus he discovered a group of islands, which he called by the name of the Saint, and landing at Botoan, belonging to the province of Caraga, in the island of Mindanao, he took possession of the new discovery in the name of the King of Spain, and there the first mass was celebrated.

He next proceeded to the island of Zebu, and gained over its chief, as well as that of Dimasua. Mactan, a small island in front of Zebu, however, resisted the Spaniards, and its chief, confident of his own strength, challenged Magallanes to land, who accepted the challenge. He took with him 50 Spaniards, attacked the Indians by advancing through a deep morass; but being wounded by an arrow, he died on the field, together with six of his men, and the rest retreated on board. Thus perished, though not ingloriously, the renowned Magallanes, whose name, in the annals of the New World, deserves to rank immediately after that of Columbus.

After the death of their leader the Spaniards chose Juan Serrano for their commander, and the Indians after this recent misfortune, no longer considering them as demigods or invincible, began to plot their destruction. They artfully disguised their designs and persuaded the new commander, accompanied by 24 of his companions, to be present at a feast prepared by Hamabar, chief of Zebu. In the midst of the entertainment concealed Indians rushed on the unsuspecting Spaniards and murdered the whole of them, with the exception of Serrano, who escaped to his ships.

Mr. STEWART. That is the first account we have of the Filipinos, and it is similar to the account of affairs as reported in Samar. After the natives had made friends with our soldiers, and while the soldiers were at breakfast, they were assassinated. That is the history of these people. Samar is near the other island spoken of by the historian. They are the same character of men. That is the character of the people with whom we have to deal, and it has been their character from the time of the discovery of those islands until quite recently.

There are now robbers wherever they can find plunder. There has been piracy going on there which could not be suppressed, and the European nations have had their fleets there to suppress piracy. They suppressed it in every other part of the world, but there are living on some of those islands

THE WORST POSSIBLE CHARACTERS.

That does not refer to all of the population. The population of Luzon were always better, but their coast towns were robbed, and they had to get into the interior to get away from these pirates. Samar was one of the piratical islands. All the islands were involved in piracy, but Luzon had always a better character than the balance.

In fighting these pirates as recently as 1846, Mr. Brooke, who was an Englishman in charge of an expedition there——

Mr. HANNA. An Englishman?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; he was an Englishman. He had charge of an expedition. All the world had been fighting them, trying to suppress them. He was criticised, I suppose the same as our soldiers are criticised, by fault-finders at home while he was trying to suppress piracy.

I read from Brooke's Borneo, volume 2, page 84. He says:

There seems to me to be a contradictory sort of sentiment pervading a portion of the English public which it is difficult to comprehend. They particularly desire to suppress piracy, but when active and intelligent means are put in operation to effect this purpose they are horrified at the possibility of coercive measures being employed.

Very much like our people here. They want us to establish a stable government, but we are not allowed to use the only methods possible to that end.

He goes on:

What do they expect? Do they really imagine that piracy is to be suppressed by argument or preaching? Do they propose to appeal to the tender feelings of these head takers? Is it by mild morality, moral maxims, Harvey's Meditations, mesmeric influence, a problem of Euclid, or Aristotle's Logic that they would overcome the difficulty and gain the desirable object of opening these waters to the peaceful trader? For my own part, I am anxious and ready to listen patiently to any well-digested plan, but, at the same time, I confess myself at a loss to discover any remedy for the deadly evil but the one which I have as yet successfully applied.

We have undertaken to establish a responsible government in Samar where no government ever existed. While I am opposed to cruelty, and while I reprobate the order of General Smith—there are many things occurring in all wars that are not justifiable. There is no doubt that many things occurred in the Southern army which Southern people regretted, but they did not stop the war for that reason; and so in the Northern army there were many things that were not justifiable, as I know, from both sides. I know that the South regretted Fort Pillow, and the North regretted many things that were done, but that did not stop the war.

NOBODY CAN JUSTIFY AN ORDER OF THAT KIND—

There has been in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, constant war. If you will read some of the accounts of proceedings in New England or in Virginia or in Pennsylvania in regard to the early wars with the Indians, you will find that our people were driven to desperation and adopted methods which would not be justified in civilized warfare. That always occurs. Why, for which he was censured at the time, but not condemned. He was afterwards elected President of the United States for two terms, and has a most illustrious record. I will read, as an illustration of what occurs under peculiar circumstances, from Appleton's Encyclopedia of American Biography, volume 3, page 378:

At St. Marks his troops captured an aged Scotch trader and friend of the Indian, named Alexander Arbuthnot; near Suwanee, some time afterwards they seized Robert Ambrister, a young English lieutenant of marines, nephew of the governor of New Providence. Jackson believed that these men had incited the Indians to make war upon the United States, and were now engaged in aiding and abetting them in their hostilities. They were tried by court-martial at St. Marks. On very insufficient evidence Arbuthnot was found guilty and sentenced to be hanged.

Appearances were somewhat more strongly against Ambrister. He did not make it clear what his business was in Florida, and threw himself upon the mercy of the court, which at first condemned him to be shot, but on further consideration commuted the sentence to 50 lashes and a year's imprisonment. Jackson arbitrarily revived the first sentence and Ambrister was accordingly shot. A few minutes afterwards Arbuthnot was hanged from the yardarm of his own ship, declaring with his last breath that his country would avenge him.

Jackson was criticised largely for this, but it was impossible for people generally to realize all the circumstances surrounding it. He opened Florida, however, and through him we acquired Florida. General Crook did many things that could not be justified in ordinary warfare.

HE WAS DEALING WITH A CRIMINAL RACE,

very much like these people of Samar. The characteristics of the Apaches, from the best history I can get, were very similar to those of the people of Samar.

The Apaches were a peculiar tribe of Indians. They were not a tribe originally, but they were guards picked up by the priests who went from Lake Superior to Santa Fe and down through into northern Mexico and Arizona and Sonora a hundred years before there was any communication with the City of Mexico. The priests selected young men from each tribe they passed through as a guard. This guard got to be quite numerous, and war was its business. Its members raided the country. They went down into the City of Mexico and robbed and plundered and got back with their plunder without serious opposition.

A most terrible race of men were the Apaches—stealing women, killing males and the children, and taking what plunder they pleased. They roamed all over Mexico. They were the terror of the whole country. They interfered with and delayed the settlement of Arizona. Governor Safford, from Nevada, who was appointed by President Grant governor of Arizona, wrote continually to me on the subject. I told him I wanted particular facts. I told him to give me the facts of the conduct of the men composing this tribe. He sent me a book including over 400 names of men, women, and children—mostly men—who had been murdered and the circumstances substantiated by affidavits as to where the murders had occurred. I took it to President Grant and he assigned to General Crook the duty of subduing them.

General Stoneman had charge, but President Grant put Crook in command on account of the conditions as described by Safford's report. General Crook then had to deal with those terrible people. No other officer had been able to do anything with them, and

HE SUBDUED THEM BY CUNNING.

He induced them to fight one against another. There was a most horrible Indian war for a couple of years, but the Apaches were overcome and the country was quelled, and life and property made secure.

Harsh means had to be adopted. They are not the means that would be used in civilized warfare. Those methods would not be adopted by civilized nations.

You would not do these acts in warfare among civilized men. Crook gave them a forcible order when he started in his work.

He sent an ultimatum to the chiefs to return to their reservations or "be wiped from the face of the earth." No attention was paid to his demand, and he attacked them in the Tonto Basin, a stronghold deemed impregnable, and enforced submission. In 1875 he was ordered to quell the disturbances in the Sioux and Cheyenne nations in the Northwest, and defeated those Indians in the battle of Powder River, Wyoming.

In March another battle resulted in the destruction of 125 lodges, and in June the battle of Tongue River was a victory for Crook. A few days later the battle of the Rosebud gave him another, when the maddened savages massed their forces and succeeded in crushing Custer. (See Custer, George Armstrong.) Crook, on receiving reenforcements, struck a severe blow at Slim Buttes, Dakota, and followed it up with such relentless vigor that by May, 1877, all the hostile tribes in the Northwest had yielded.

Crook adopted more severe means in all his wars than have ever been adopted in the Philippines. He did not write so many orders—he acted; and he was made a major-general for his great services in saving human life. Those countries are now inhabited, and Arizona is coming in as a State. I hope the Senate will concur in the action of the House and admit Arizona as a State.

Now, I condemn any cruelty that can be avoided.

I CONDEMN THE ORDER OF SMITH

as foolish and wicked. There was no necessity for giving it. I do not know whether anything was done under it or not. That order must be condemned, but the general condemnation of our soldiers there is without any reason at all. We know that they have acted as humanely as was possible. We know the American Army always does.

There will be violations of military laws even among the most civilized nations, and court-martials are frequent even there, but where the enemy makes war by deceit, from ambush, and never meets in the open field, he is an assassin, as he is in the Philippines, where he will make friends and stab them. We have had in the West that kind of an enemy. I tell you it is a hard place to put an American soldier, in that climate in those jungles, contending with such a foe. It is a hard place, but they are doing it at the command of the United States. They have no option; they must go. They are soldiers of the United States, and they are compelled to go where this Government sends them. Is there no consideration for their situation?

I do not believe that the American people are going to take any stock in

THE GENERAL ABUSE OF THE ARMY.

They will condemn, as they always have done, any violation of the laws of war in acts of cruelty. They will call for justice to be administered in the usual way. But they will not try the United States Army, 6,000 miles away, on ex parte testimony, and the heat of debate here will not mislead the country.

The people will be sorry that in the United States Senate the Army, in which their friends and brothers and relatives are engaged, are indiscriminately denounced, although Senators on the other side may say they do not intend to denounce the Army. There is nothing the Army does that they do not denounce. The people have confidence in the Army. They always have had confidence in the Army. The Army in the Philippines ought to have the confidence and sympathy of the American people, because they are sent on the most arduous task that any soldiers of the United States were ever commanded to fulfill.

The people also have confidence in Judge Taft and his associates. They have borne a good character in this country. They are all men of high character and they are well known. The people are willing that they shall work out this problem, a problem which is the problem of the United States and not of any party. It must be done. The more general abuse is indulged in, the more general complaint there is without reason, the worse it will be for the complainants.

THIS QUESTION OUGHT NOT TO BE A POLITICAL ISSUE.

It was not a political issue when we got the Philippines. It was not a political issue when we sent the army there. That was done by the vote of all. It was not a political issue when the mandates of Congress and of the country were carried out, and it is not a political issue as to how they shall manage it. The only political issue made by these proceedings is whether we will promise before we are able to perform and when we do not know that we shall ever be able to perform such promise.

I believe that the strong hand of the United States must be placed behind the Filipinos to hold them up. It has got to be behind the citizens who are there to protect them. It has got to stand behind every man for the next fifty years if we carry out the obligation that we assumed when we ratified the treaty with Spain. When we undertook to protect the life and property of the foreigners and to do justice to all men in those islands, we undertook an arduous task, it is true; but the nation is committed to it, and the United States never failed to perform any undertaking that it entered upon, and it must perform it now. It may be embarrassing; it may be difficult on account of the complaining at home—but our mission must be performed.

The Filipinos have friends here in the United States fighting their battles, and they are being taught that all they need do is to continue to assassinate and to continue their systems of treachery to achieve ultimate success. I say it is unjust to our soldiers, it is unjust to this country, to encourage an enemy in arms by promises. There ought not to be a party in this country that will make those promises, to involve soldiers in peril more than necessary, to involve the country in expense, and prolong the time when civil government can be established. The time will be protracted if we continue to encourage the enemy to assassinate our soldiers and assassinate the helpless Filipinos who are our friends, if we continue to encourage in their opposition a race of men who in some of those islands have been pirates and robbers from time immemorial.

The United States has undertaken this task. It will build up the Philippine Archipelago. It will overcome all opposition. I warn my friends on the other side that there is no political gain in their attitude on this question. Every word they say against the Army will react in the hundred thousand ex-soldiers scattered over the country and the millions that sympathize with them, the millions that admire our Army, the millions that know the hardships that they are subjected to, the millions who feel aggrieved at anything that looks like an attack upon the Army or the policy which grew out of the war, the ratification of the treaty, and the appropriations made to govern the country. I tell you that the people will uphold the Army.

This issue was submitted practically in the campaign of 1900. It was called imperialism. It did not avail. The people did not heed it. The people said, "We have planted our flag in the Philippine islands; we have undertaken to hold them and civilize them; we can not retreat; we are under obligations that we can not ignore."

Now, as far as I am concerned, I believe the acquisition of those islands will

and of the people thereof. It will make markets, it will create commerce, and we will civilize the people and do them good.

Where have the American people gone that they did not do good? Have they not done good from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the savages they found here? Did they not carry blessings to Florida? Did they not carry blessings to California and to New Mexico, and wherever they went? Does anybody doubt their ability to do it again?

The idea is absurd to talk about the Filipinos being fit for self-government and that they will protect life and property when they are every day assassinating their own fellow-citizens and their own neighbors for showing friendliness to the United States. Do you think they will protect the property of those who have been friendly to us, or pretended to be friendly? No; they show a disposition directly the other way.

Now, there are many things in this bill that are very admirable; for example, the monetary system. I do not see how a better one could have been devised. I do not say this because it is silver, because that question is past, but the bill provides for a stable currency, for a regular supply of legal-tender money when not otherwise provided by law.

IT OPENS THE MINTS TO THE COINAGE OF SILVER.

They will get along well when they have plenty of money.

As to the silver question, I beg pardon for digressing enough to say a word. Some have intimated that I have changed my views upon the money question. Very far from it. I never changed at all. Those who accuse me of it do not know anything about the money question. They accuse me, through their ignorance, of being inconsistent. The United States were using both gold and silver and had been from time immemorial, when some schemers demonetized silver. There was not gold enough for use as money. Hard times came and lasted for twenty years. Then the gold mines became productive, so that the gold supplied the place of both metals. There have been fourteen or fifteen hundred millions of new gold added to the stock we had on hand in the last six years.

So we have good times. Some of our friends, however, say that it is on account of the gold standard; that there is something in the material gold which makes it money. It is law of legal tender, not the kind of material from which it is made. Gold is no more money than beef, or pork, or flour, or any other commodity. It is the stamp of the Government which is the law that makes it money, and if we have enough good legal-tender money it does not make any difference of what material we make it.

Now, Aristotle explained that

twenty-two hundred years ago. Nobody has ever been able to confute what he said. The world thought for a long time that silver was money, without regard to law, but when they took the stamp of legal tender off it was only silver. The world then found it silver metal, not money. The legal-tender power of the government is all that makes money, whether it is printed on gold, silver, or paper.

Thus the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the law of Congress makes money. Thus the highest courts of Great Britain have decided. Thus every intelligent man ought to know. I do not believe that the use of any one metal or that the two metals are the best modes of ascertaining quantity. The general range of prices should regulate the quantity. The quantity of money in circulation should be sufficient to maintain the stability of prices, but it need not be made of any particular material. Of course the law makes it money. Take the law off of gold and you will see whether it is money or not.

I read a short time ago of a Secretary of the Treasury who went down to Richmond, Va., and talked to the bankers there and said that they had found a metal that was always of the same value. If a mountain of gold were discovered, you would see if it would be of the same value, and if gold would buy as much wheat as now. The output of gold shows that that is not the case. Putting out fourteen or fifteen hundred million dollars of gold has raised prices. Gold is not worth as much as it was in 1896. I left the Republican party on that question, because the scarcity of money was ruining the country. There was not money enough, and the millions were suffering under it. But when we got relief by the output of gold then I was not fool enough to follow up a dead issue.

The issue of silver is dead, so far as the United States is concerned, until

THE GOLD MINES GIVE OUT.

The time may come when we shall have the same trouble over again, because civilization has had this trouble from the foundation of the world, or as far back as history goes. When the mines were productive we had civilization, and when the mines became exhausted we had hard times and barbarism. During the dark ages the people had no mining, and even lost the art of separating gold and silver from the baser metals. There was no mining and no money; no civilization. A few men had the money, and the balance were slaves. This condition may come again, if the gold mines give out.

It looks now, from the prospect we have before us, that there will be gold enough for some time to come. That may be true for the next fifty years. I do not expect to see the issue again. No man can now go out and make a silver speech and get a decent hearing. I suppose the world will adhere to the use of gold for a while, but the time may come when gold will be abandoned. The discovery of a mountain of gold would cause the immediate abandonment of gold as a money metal.

No one commodity or two commodities will at all times bear the same numerical relation to all other commodities to be exchanged therewith. So long as metal money of any kind is coined without limit the equity of contracts will depend upon the accidents of mining. Price is the true guide, and when legislation shall provide a quantity of money clothed with legal-tender power which shall maintain stability of prices, a plunge into barbarism will not again occur when the mines fail.

Thus I wrote fifteen years ago. Anyone who will read what I have written will see that I have not been inconsistent. I have only said that silver is no better than gold, when we have gold enough. The only trouble with mankind is that there will not be enough. It is fluctuating. The idea that the equity of contracts should depend upon the accidents of mining is very hard on mankind.

But

THIS BILL IS BENEFICIAL TO THE MINERS.

It will make a larger market for silver. You want a larger market for silver just the same as you want a larger market for lead. The lead miner wants a larger market for lead. We want a larger market for silver whether we use it or not, because many of our people are engaged in mining silver. In mining copper, lead, and almost all metals it is a by-product, and you must mine silver if you mine other metals.

To have this rise in the price of silver is very important to my State. This bill will help my people considerably because it will make an additional market for silver and raise the price to those engaged in that business. The goldites used to accuse us by saying that our only motive in advocating silver was to get a market for silver. That was my last motive. I wanted to get silver used as money for the benefit of my constituents, but I never argued the money question for that reason. I argued the money question because I believed that it was necessary to the happiness of the country that there should not be a shrinkage of the money volume, and misery everywhere.

I was perfectly astonished when the Democratic party, in 1900, put the free coinage of silver in their platform, for the issue had been killed by the output of gold. There is nothing in following that forlorn hope. It is dead, and it will be a dead issue, and all money issues that have lived will be dead, for as long as we have the present output of gold we shall have good times. You talk about good times. It comes from more money. Never in the history of the world has there been a time when the volume of money was increasing that they did not have good times. Hume wrote over a hundred years ago that a country with less money, but with its volume increasing, was less miserable and more prosperous than another country with a larger volume of money which was decreasing. It is the decrease of the volume of the money which brings misery. There is nothing which afflicts mankind so much as a decrease in the volume of money.

The untold misery that was created by the decrease in the volume of money by the demonetization of silver will never be realized. The misery that grew out of it never can be told, and I hope it will not be repeated. I am sure it will not be as long as the gold mines continue. When they give out it may come. We do not know when. And then surely you will have the same thing over again. You will have all the miseries of the dark ages. You will have the miseries of which we had a taste between 1873 and 1896.

Now, this provision in the bill gives the Filipinos a stable currency.

IT OPENS A MARKET FOR SILVER, to which they are accustomed. It is a wise provision. There are also provisions in the bill in regard to mining laws. There are mines in the islands that our people want to work, and they will go there for that purpose, because they will go anywhere in the world for a mine. We have not only a mining law, but a law for opening the lands of the friars, and thus remove an evil against which Filipinos have been contending for years. They have complained of it as one of their greatest grievances, and the bill proposes to remove it.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me? I have been very much entertained in hearing the Senator return to a subject about which he has not spoken much of late. I simply would like to ask the Senator, for information, whether he still entertains the same opinion relative to the act of 1873 which I have so often heard him express in this Chamber?

Mr. STEWART. That act horrifies me more the oftener I think of it. I think it was the most unmitigated piece of cruelty ever perpetrated in any civilized country; whether ignorantly or willfully, it matters not.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator still think it was a crime?

Mr. STEWART. If it was knowingly done, it was an infamous crime. It may have been ignorantly done, but I am afraid some people knew what they were doing. I hope they did not, because if there is any punishment hereafter, if they knew what they were doing they are certainly in danger. The act was a great calamity. It was a calamity that affected all civilization, and that calamity rested upon us until there came to our relief the output of gold.

So far as that is concerned this bill makes it possible for Americans to go there and get land, to get mines, to do business, and make contracts and know what they are doing. That is necessary. If you are going to have any civilization in that country you must have enterprise. It is enterprise and business that keeps civilization from sinking into savagery. It is an object lesson that will be afforded by Americans going there. Under this bill we can give them that object lesson.

The bill of the minority presents no object lesson. It presents no mining law. It presents no currency. It presents nothing which will enlighten and raise the standard of those people. It simply tells them, "When you establish a stable government and give a guaranty (and they do not know what that means) to protect life and property and carry out our treaties with Spain we will let you go your own way." The minority propose in their bill to have England and a whole lot of other countries aid us in preventing any other country taking possession of it.

If that scheme is carried out, just as it has for the last five hundred years. Without Spain they would have been at war all the time. It has been their business to rob each other and steal from the outside. That has been the business of those who live along the coast. Those in the interior are the sufferers. The people of Luzon and that territory have always been a better people than those in Samar and the other islands farther south; but you offer them a promise that they shall have liberty, that they shall have independence when they accomplish what it is utterly impossible for them to accomplish, and you and I know it.

ANARCHY WILL PREVAIL

They can not accomplish it without the protecting hand of the United States. Would the Seminoles have established a government in Florida, maintained law and order, if they had been let alone and freed from Spain? Would the people of New Mexico have been able to establish a stable government without our aid, among whom you find now intelligent men able to take their place in any legislative assembly? You find them that way after fifty years of example, living in a civilized country, being protected, and you see what the effect will be on them. I have visited the legislature of New Mexico at different times in the last forty years. The change there is marvelous, and so it will be in the Philippines. All you want is to restrain them until you can furnish them an object lesson.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada if he is quite sure that New Mexico is about to be a State? I should like to know that myself, if he can give me any assurance of it.

Mr. STEWART. Undoubtedly the Senator would be pleased to have it become a State.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. The most numerous branch of the National Legislature here has passed an act to admit it. It has passed through the lower House.

Mr. TELLER. I know it.

Mr. STEWART. The lower House has not been more liberal than the Senate in that regard. It will undoubtedly be passed here, I presume.

Mr. BACON. The Nicaragua Canal bill has passed the other House twice, but that affords no guarantee that it will come to a vote here.

Mr. STEWART. The Nicaragua Canal bill has some conditions surrounding it that are peculiar, and which I have not time to discuss.

Mr. TILLMAN. What about the Cuban reciprocity bill? That bill, giving justice to the Cubans, has passed the House, too.

Mr. STEWART. That was sent here to be digested. It was not passed as they want it. We will probably digest it. We are able to do that; but I do not think we have ever turned down a State the other House was willing to admit. I do not believe it ever has been done. The States have been admitted from here. The Senate has been much more liberal in admitting new States than the House.

I noticed some slurs against Nevada in the House when the Arizona bill was under consideration and nobody defended the State there. I think such slurs gratuitous. It was said they did not want any more Nevadas admitted. But they have forgotten, or they do not keep the run of the history of the times.

NEVADA IS GROWING VERY RAPIDLY.

She has a great many good mines now; more, in fact, than any other State in the Union. A wonderful progress exists there in the way of railroad building, mining, agriculture, etc. We have plenty of population, if quality is taken in consideration.

We have always had enough population to get along pretty well, for what we lacked in numbers we made up in quality. We have always been ready to meet our neighbors on that score. We never mourned about the lack of population, because we knew we had great resources which eventually would bring population. Nevada is going to be one of the foremost States in the American Union, and I hope our friends will not spend any more time sympathizing with Nevada. We have plenty of prosperity in Nevada now, and we do not want sympathy. When you have prosperity you do not want sympathy.

I have, however, been led off from what I was saying. I say that it is education and business which Americans take with them which elevate the people. That was the case in California. We took possession of that country, and the natives who were there now furnish members of the State legislature, governors, judges, and Representatives in Congress.

Mexico has had an object lesson and furnished her great man, Diaz, one of the most remarkable men whom this hemisphere has produced. He has brought order out of chaos. He has introduced railroads, telegraphs, and all the paraphernalia of modern civilization into that country. The great mass of the Mexican people have advanced more in the last twenty years than they did from the time of the discovery of America until

THE TIME WHEN DIAZ WAS PLACED IN CONTROL.

The people of the Philippine Islands must have object lessons. Give them an opportunity to see what can be done by enterprise, by business, by railroads, by telegraphs, and let them become engaged in business enterprises which will occupy their attention, and they will rapidly advance.

But here in the substitute of the minority it is not proposed to do anything for the Filipinos; it is not proposed that there shall be any building of railroads or telegraphs for them; it is not proposed to aid them by opening up their mines or giving them opportunities for employment. They know nothing about government; they know nothing about establishing a form of government that will protect life and property and guarantee to carry out the obligations of the United States which we assumed under the treaty with Spain or to protect the lives of foreigners and the lives of their own citizens.

We know the Filipinos alone and unaided can not do it in a hundred years. We will have to keep our hands on them. We have undertaken before the world to develop the Archipelago, to maintain law and order there, to give those people an opportunity to enjoy the benefits of our civilization, and the world an opportunity to trade without fear of being molested. We have pledged ourselves to perform certain obligations to the world and to Spain, and both Houses of Congress have made appropriations for that purpose. The treaty requires it. It is our Government which is engaged in this work. Now, shall we say stop, stop; throw away all that has been accomplished, and, having driven Spain out, shall we let anarchy prevail there?

Some say we should establish a protectorate. This Government is not going to protect governments away off in the Orient. When we undertake to set up a protectorate in the Orient other countries will have something to say about it. We have on this continent because it is within the sphere of our influence, and because we are interested in maintaining it here.

The rest of the world respects it here because we have some power to enforce our demands, but when we undertake to say that the nations of the world shall not interfere with the Philippine Islands we must have a Navy to enforce that position which will be equal to the navies of all the world. There can be no protectorate of that kind. We must either go forward and accomplish what we have undertaken to do, establish law and order, give the Filipinos good government, give them an opportunity to enjoy the fruits of liberty, as all other countries do—we must either do that, or acknowledge ignominious defeat and disgrace.

The American people are not prepared for that. They are not going to take any step backward; they never have taken a step backward, and they are not going to do it now. Any man who predicates his hope upon public sentiment changing will find himself sadly mistaken. There may be cruelties perpetrated by the army in the Philippines, but there will be punishment. When was it that the American people could not punish crime—could not restrain our soldiers? We have always done it, and will continue to do so.

If cruelties have been perpetrated in the Philippine Islands, let the offenders be tried where the offenses were committed and where the facts exist; but do not try the American Army, fighting in the Philippines, 6,000 miles away, on ex parte testimony. It is not a fair trial, and the American people are not satisfied with that kind of a trial. They do not want tried where they can not be heard, and they do not believe that the American Government is going to do any great wrong. It never has. It never has violated the principles of good government.

Our country has had an onward progress for more than one hundred years. It may make mistakes, but they will be little ones, not the great mistake of surrendering our trust. Perhaps we ought not to have undertaken the trust, but we have accepted it by the voice of the whole American people, and by both Houses of Congress. The war was prosecuted; we were victorious; the treaty was ratified; appropriations were made; and, as I said before, we have undertaken to establish good government in the islands, and we can not retreat. We will not promise to retreat.

Promises are idle now. Let the work we started out to do be done, and then it will be time enough to see what we shall do next. There will be as wise men in Congress then as there are now. I have faith in coming Congresses. When you say you must provide for the contingencies that may happen hereafter, it is a declaration that we do not believe that the Congresses that are to follow will be as patriotic and as intelligent as are we. If that were so, that would be the end of the Republic.

THE REPUBLIC CAN NOT LIVE

unless we continue to have intelligent and patriotic members of the two Houses of Congress. You will have them even more intelligent fifty years from now, or even twenty years from now, than they are to-day. Whenever good government is established in these islands they will know whether they can trust the Filipinos or not. But one thing is certain: The American people will never fail to discharge the obligations that they have taken upon themselves in that treaty, and taken with the consent of all parties.

More than that, the action is sanctified by the blood of hundreds of the best American citizens who ever lived. Many of our brave boys have offered up their lives in those far-away islands. Every neighborhood from which a boy has gone to the Philippines and lost his life over there feels an interest in this question. Every patriotic man feels the obligations that we have assumed, and he will not ask this Government to lower the flag. Where the American flag is planted and has been watered by the blood of brave men, it will stay and never be pulled down. Do not intimate such a thing.

The party that intimates

THE PULLING DOWN OF THE AMERICAN FLAG

under the circumstances in which it is floating in the Philippines will be repudiated by the American people. I hope no one will make such a suggestion. Some Senators on the other side have been already apologizing for such expressions, and I am glad to hear it.

Our Army should be free from such attacks as we have heard here. If orders have been issued like those which General Smith is said to have issued, which are criminal, let those who promulgate them be tried by courts-martial. The Army is abundantly able to take care of itself and its honor. It will do what is right. Fear not.

I do not wish to prolong this discussion. I think there has been too much said already; but before anything was said, before a witness was examined, we knew what our duty was; we knew that we were bound to give the Filipinos a government. We must go forward in that work. We have undertaken it, and we can not turn back, We did not need evidence to know that. We might take evidence in regard to the form of the government we should establish, in regard to the character of the mining, currency, and other laws. We should have confined our investigations to those things. Nobody proposes to change the civil government and nobody proposes to abolish military rule there. That is not proposed either in the bill of the majority or in the substitute offered by the minority.

The plan of the majority is to go on until which can perform all the obligations which we have assumed in those islands. Why embarrass them by finding fault now? There is nothing that can be truly said against Governor Taft. A better man could not be selected in any part of the world. How can the situation be benefited or improved? Suggestions for the improvement of the bill are in order, but suggestions that the American flag shall be hauled down in the Philippines under these circumstances will be repudiated by all patriotic men, North and South. It is not a ladder on which to climb into office.

Senators talk about giving up the Philippines and abandoning our trust. It would be a disgrace in the eyes of the world for us to do so. I hope that such an issue as that will not be presented to the American people even if the Senators of the minority advocate it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator takes his seat, will he not be kind enough to give us some information or light on the questions presented in sections 79 and 80 of this bill?

Mr. STEWART. What is the character of the sections to which the Senator refers?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will read them. Section 79 provides:

SEC. 79. That the said Philippine government is authorized to coin a silver dollar, which shall contain 416 grains of standard silver, and the standard of said silver coins shall be such that of 1,000 parts by weight 900 shall be of pure metal and 100 of alloy, and the alloy shall be of copper. And upon the said silver dollar there shall be devices and inscriptions to be prescribed by the government of the Philippine Islands, with the approval of the Secretary of War of the United States, which devices and inscriptions shall express or symbolize the sovereignty of the United States and that it is a coin of the Philippine Islands, together with the denomination of the coin expressed in English, Filipino, and Chinese characters, and the date of its coinage.

Then section 80 provides for the deposit of bullion, the same as we do at our own mints for gold. I should like to ask the Senator to tell us while we are putting this over there, if it is a good thing, why do we not put it here? The Senator has just said that he has not changed his views. This is a very cloudy subject to me, and I can not see why we should want to give a blessing to the Filipinos and not get a little of it ourselves. I hope the Senator will give us some light on that subject.

Mr. STEWART. I will do so. That is a very easy thing to do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am in the dark, and of course I can get light from the Senator from Nevada in a great many directions.

Mr. STEWART. You can get light in this direction if you will pay attention. There is no doubt about that.

The dollar provided for in the section just read is equivalent to the Mexican dollar. It is about the same weight I believe, as the Mexican dollar. The Mexican dollar is circulating throughout the Orient, and has been so circulating almost from time immemorial. The Orientals know exactly its value. The dollar that we allow the Filipinos to coin will be of the same value, and they will soon get accustomed to using it. It will make a market for silver, and besides that it will give them a stable coin. They are not yet prepared for paper money, and they can not have gold there because they can not possibly have a gold circulation. They could not get gold in sufficiently small denominations; and if you introduced gold, you would change the entire customs of the people. They have been using the Mexican dollar for a long time and know all about it.

When you give them the coin proposed in the pending bill you will be conforming to the customs there and which, I think, is very wise, and I congratulate the committee on the adoption of that provision in the bill. It will be beneficial in the way of affording a market for silver, and will give those people, as I have said, a stable currency of the kind that they have been in the habit of using. It is a currency with which they can trade with China, and it will be perfectly understood both by them and by their neighbors, because the Mexican dollar has been used there from time immemorial, and they understand its weight and fineness as well as we do.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to ask the Senator how he thinks it will affect the trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands to have the silver standard over there and have the gold standard here?

Mr. STEWART. Just as it affects the trade between the United States and China to-day; just as it affects the trade between the United States and the Philippine Islands to-day. It is the same standard they now have.

Mr. LODGE. And with Mexico.

Mr. STEWART. They have the same standard, the silver standard, in the Orient and in Mexico, with whom we trade.

Mr. CARMACK. The point on which I wished to get the Senator's statement was this, whether or not it would tend to increase the trade between the United States and the Philippines or facilitate commercial intercourse between the two countries to assimilate their monetary systems?

Mr. STEWART. The committee have thought it best to let them have this monetary system. I have often explained that the country having the cheaper money has the advantage in trade with countries having dearer money. India had a great advantage in that respect over England. They almost destroyed the manufactures of England, because they manufactured with silver and then sold their products in England for gold, thus competing with England; but now all Europe has adopted the gold standard.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. CARMACK. That was not the point to which I was directing the attention of the Senator. As I understand it, India having a silver standard, the advantage in trade between India and Great Britain has been with India.

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. CARMACK. And that Great Britain has suffered very largely because of that fact?

Mr. STEWART. Prices have been regulated by fixing the gold value of silver.

Mr. CARMACK. The point to which I was trying to direct the attention of the Senator was, Will not the same result occur from our relation with the Philippines? If they have the silver standard and if this country has the gold standard, will that not tend to destroy trade between the United States and the Philippines, as it has destroyed trade between Great Britain and India?

Mr. STEWART. It will not have the same effect on our trade with the Philippines as in trade between Great Britain and India. The wages of labor did not go up with inflated prices. India could manufacture more cheaply than it could be done in England, and that hurt England.

THERE IS NO IMMEDIATE DANGER of that happening in the Philippines, because they are not a manufacturing people. They trade in raw materials, and so it makes no difference; but where they have cheaper money they have the advantage in manufacturing over a country which has to manufacture with dearer money.

A great commotion was created in England on account of the great advantage free silver gave India over the mother country. Meetings were called there to enter protest, and they have been trying to fix the standard by legislation. They first tried putting India on a gold standard, but they could not do that. Then they undertook to keep the value of the rupee permanent, so as to prevent fluctuation. They have it now so that the fluctuation is not so great as formerly. They have equalized it by various devices; but silver money will afford no particular advantage in the Philippines, or it will amount to nothing, because they are not a manufacturing country, and their labor is not organized.

If they should become a manufacturing country, as China might become a manufacturing country, and there were enough of them, it would affect us just the same as England was affected. I do not think the Filipinos will enter into manufactures until they get an established government, a government that can give guaranties, and I do not expect to live to see that done.

Mr. CARMACK. Does the Senator think that this legislation will encourage manufacturing in the Philippines as similar legislation did in India?

Mr. STEWART. It will, and to a certain extent I should like to see it.

Mr. CARMACK. And at our expense?

Mr. STEWART. I do not think there will be enough of it to be of much expense to us. I think that is too remote a contingency to contemplate.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. I understand the Senator to have said that when the American flag is once raised anywhere in territories it is never proper to take it down?

Mr. STEWART. No; I did not say that.

Mr. RAWLINS. That it "must stay put?"

Mr. STEWART. I did not say that.

Mr. RAWLINS. That we can not withdraw in honor from any territory that has come into our possession?

Mr. STEWART. I did not say that.

Mr. RAWLINS. That it would be a national disgrace to withdraw from the Philippine Islands?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I think it would.

Mr. RAWLINS. Now I have got the point of the Senator, that it is unpatriotic to suggest such a thing?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. RAWLINS. That is the position the Senator took?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I think it is.

Mr. RAWLINS. Now, I want to invite the attention of the Senator to this language employed by General Grant in his Memoirs. I read from volume 1, page 53:

For myself I was bitterly opposed to the measure—

That is, to the Mexican war—and to this day regard the war which resulted as one of the most unjust ever waged by a stronger against a weaker nation. It was an instance of a republic following the bad example of European monarchies in not considering justice in their desire to acquire additional territory.

I now read from page 56——

Mr. STEWART. Are you going to read the whole book?

Mr. RAWLINS. No; but I want to read this language of General Grant. He says:

It is to the credit of the American nation, however, that after conquering Mexico, and while practically holding the country in our possession, so that we could have retained the whole of it, or made any terms we chose, we paid a round sum for the additional territory taken—more than it was worth, or was likely to be, to Mexico. To us it was an empire and of incalculable value; but it might have been obtained by other means. The Southern rebellion was largely the outgrowth of the Mexican war. Nations, like individuals, are punished for their transgressions. We got our punishment in the most sanguinary and expensive war of modern times.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada decline to yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know what question the Senator is going to predicate on what he has just read?

Mr. RAWLINS. If the Senator will be patient for just a moment——

Mr. STEWART. Very well.

Mr. RAWLINS. After we had conquered Mexico and it was absolutely in our possession—which can not be said of the Philippine Islands—in June of the year to which the memoirs of this distinguished General refer, our flag was taken down and the troops of this great nation withdrawn. I want to ask whether or not the Senator approves of that?

Mr. STEWART. I approve of just what was done. No doubt about that.

Mr. RAWLINS. Then the Senator is not——

Mr. STEWART. I want to say my own say. I have not said anything of that kind.

Mr. SPOONER. Let the Senator draw the parallel.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; let him explain the parallel. There is no parallel whatever in the two cases. I said that where our flag was planted with the pledge to keep it there, where we undertook to carry out obligations, and where it was sanctified by the blood of our soldiers, there it would stay.

In the Mexican war we overran that country and could have taken it all, as General Grant says, but we did not see fit to do so. We paid Mexico a large amount of money and took only a part of the country that was then of no use to her. After we had done that, after the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo had been ratified, and we had undertaken to protect the rights of citizens, native and foreign in that country—after we had undertaken that, to pull down our flag would have been a disgrace. That would have been a parallel. It would be like pulling down our flag in California after it was planted there, after the treaty had been made and the American people were emigrating to that part of the country. The pledge of the nation was that they should stay there as citizens and be protected. That would be a parallel.

WE CONQUERED SPAIN,

we took the Philippines, and we pledged ourselves in the treaty with Spain to maintain law and order in the Islands, to preserve the rights of Spain, and to protect the rights of foreigners there. We undertook this before all the world, and to take down the flag now, I say, would be a disgrace. Where the flag is planted with obligations to maintain it in the treaty and in the laws and in the blood of our soldiers it will stay there. The American people will never turn their backs upon such obligations.

Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee one question. I ask if he approves of that portion of the bill providing for the coinage of silver in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. CARMACK. I think I have not approved of any part of the bill that I have found yet; but so far as that particular part of it is concerned, I make no objection to it. I was simply asking the opinion of the Senator from Nevada as an expert on this question. On this question I should like to have some information from the Senator, or have him express his views upon it.

Mr. STEWART. All right.

Mr. CARMACK. I do not say that I am opposed to that particular feature of the bill at all. On the contrary, I am inclined to think that it would be wrong for this country to undertake to change the monetary conditions which prevail there now. I have not asked the question of the Senator with a view of opposing that feature of the bill. I thought he had made a study of this question and was an expert; and so I wanted to hear from him some explanation in regard to it.

Mr. STEWART. That is all right. I do not think any Senator here is opposed to that feature of the bill, on either side of the Chamber; and I do not think there is any serious objection to the mining feature or the land feature of the bill, or to buying out and getting rid of the friars. I do not think there is any serious objection to doing what the Filipinos want to do in excluding the Chinese.

The Filipinos have sent their protest here, saying that they do not want the Chinese; and we know that that feeling exists there. We have done as they desired in that respect, and we propose to do as they desire in respect to the friars' lands. We have relieved them from that oppression. We have relieved them from many others. We have a great work to accomplish in the islands, and there is no doubt that we will accomplish it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I wish to say that he has not finished elucidating the silver phase of this bill at all.

Mr. STEWART. Go on and ask more questions, then.

Mr. TILLMAN. When the Senator used to wax eloquent and I was a pupil under his tuition here in the glories of free silver, it seems to me that I recall that the party generally with which he is now affiliated used to oppose our contention on this side, and his contention, with the argument that to have the United States on a silver basis and the balance of the world—that is, the European world—on a gold basis, would interfere with the exchanges to such an extent that we would be hampered in our commercial relations and intercourse with Europe, and that we could not possibly endure such a thing. Now the Senator says that the free coinage of silver and a silver basis in the Philippines will not interfere in the slightest with the exchanges between the United States and our colonies. I should like to have the Senator give us a little light upon the change of front, or the change of heart, or the change of conditions through which his mind has reached this conclusion.

Mr. STEWART. Give me an opportunity and I will do it with pleasure. All I want is an opportunity. I have had no change of heart, but there has been a change of conditions. I have contended in every speech that if this country would have free silver it would break Europe if they would not follow us.

Mr. TILLMAN. And now you want the Filipinos to break us.

Mr. STEWART. They are not big enough to do that. If they were as big as we are, I should be very much afraid of them. If they were a manufacturing country I should be afraid to give them free coinage, but they are not. They would have the same experience in that regard as India had.

A good many of my friends on the other side did not understand my position at all. I have been misunderstood, but I thought my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] did understand me on that subject. My views are the same to-day as they have ever been, but now conditions have changed. We have gold enough to furnish a sufficient volume of money, and we have good times, and I want to let well enough alone.

Accommodating the Filipinos with a suitable currency in silver, which they have always had, without any change, is not going to injure us materially unless they become a great manufacturing country; then it will be time to change. There may be a difference in the output of gold by that time. Things may change as rapidly as other issues that are presented, but I will understand them when they arise, because I understand the question. I knew when the silver question was dead, and I did not advocate putting it in any platform. I knew when it was dead and realized that it would be buried until the present large output of gold ceased.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. One of the arguments which used to be made with reference to the effect of the silver standard in the silver countries was that it operated as a bounty upon exports.

Mr. STEWART. It did.

Mr. CARMACK. Does the Senator think it will have that effect in the Philippine Islands?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; I think it will to some extent. All Asia has an advantage in being on the silver standard. It is held down by the Western world. They have not the advantages they had before we attained plenty of gold. When we were hard up for money they had a great advantage, and India prospered as she never had prospered.

She sprang forward; she was able to supply the markets in the Orient, and the weavers and manufacturers of various kinds held meetings and they sent here volumes of protests against it, which I read before the Senate. They could not stand the competition that occurred; but now if the Orient stands by silver and we stand by gold and gold happens to be scarcer than silver, you will feel it. But England has tied the hands of India, so that India can not do much harm.

Mr. CARMACK. The point I wished to make in that connection was: If the silver standard in the Philippines operates as a bounty upon exports we will be in the position of putting up a tariff in the United States against sugar, for instance, from the Philippines, and at the same time, by our monetary policy, giving a bounty upon sugar.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, well, that is to be temporary. We shall not have a tariff long; and they are not going to manufacture enough to hurt us. It is magnifying the thing too much to think that they are going to hurt us in that way.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is one other question I should like to ask before the Senator takes his seat. I notice in the section just read it is said—which devices and inscriptions shall express or symbolize the sovereignty of the United States and that it is a coin of the Philippine Islands, together with the denomination of the coin expressed in English, Filipino, and Chinese characters, and the date of its coinage.

Will the Senator tell me what "Filipino" is in that sense? I do not recall who it was, but I thought some one who was arguing against the possibility of any government by the Philippine people among themselves, or any cooperation because of the various nationalities and tribes and languages which we all know exist there, stated that there was no such thing as a Filipino language; but it seems that the chairman of the committee, or the committee, or some one, has discovered a Filipino language, and if the Senator has received that information from the source from which I suppose the committee got it I would like to have it.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose the committee thought as the Filipinos might have some kinds of characters there, it would be natural to use them, and if they have, all right. It will do no harm to have a device on the coin. I think that is a discussion between tweedledee and tweedledum, and tweedledee may have the advantage. I do not know whether the inscription is necessary or not, but it is well enough. I have never contended that they did not have a language.

Mr. ALLISON. They have many languages.

Mr. STEWART. They have many languages, and in many tribes a jargon of languages, as was the case among the Indians. The Indians all had languages here, but one tribe could not understand another. There are some very highly educated people in the Philippine Islands, but they have never been able to sustain any kind of government. Perhaps Spain would not allow them to do so. They have had no experience in government. They know nothing about government at all.

In Samar and in that locality they were engaged in the business of piracy for some three or four hundred years, and when Magellan discovered the island they killed him and his followers by treachery. They have undoubtedly had a language. The pirates had a language, but what of that?

That is not material. Most of the tribes can understand themselves. Sometimes they can not understand their neighbors. Nobody has ever contended that they have not some kind of language. You will find that everywhere. There are no people who have not some kind of language and these people undoubtedly have. I do not think the fact that you try to stamp on the coin in the Filipino language some marks that they understand will do any harm.

I do not know whether the silver coin will be a success or not. The United States have tried to accommodate the Filipinos all they can, but the great accommodation is giving them a standard coin and giving them full value. If money is less valuable than bullion it will be regulated by its value, so far as the outside world is concerned in trade. It will be regulated by its bullion value in trade with the United States, as we have to regulate it in trading with all Oriental countries, as Europe has to do, except in India, where England is arbitrarily trying to fix the ratio to make the value of the rupee permanent. It will have to be regulated by its bullion value. I know Japan made a great mistake in adopting the gold standard when she did. She had a great advantage over the rest of the world under the silver standard.

Mr. TELLER. Everybody knows that.

Mr. STEWART. Everybody knows Japan made a great mistake. Her statesmen were going forward with marvelous speed. They had all the advantages in their favor because they were a manufacturing country, but they have given that up, and so they do not enjoy that advantage now. There would be no special advantage to the Filipinos in trade with us until they became a manufacturing country. Then it will be an advantage.

Mr. CARMACK. It is not a producing country of any kind.

Mr. STEWART. No; they produce nothing but anarchy, and they are prolific in that and always have been. They produce robbers at sea and anarchy on land, and they have shown no disposition to produce anything else; but we will teach them, as we have taught the Mexicans, and as we have taught the Spaniards in Florida, and as we have taught people everywhere we have gone what good government is.

We will teach them by our enterprise, by our example, how to be civilized. We will teach them by our government. We will teach them by showing them we can administer justice and that we can protect life and property. It is a lesson they need. It is a lesson we undertake to give them. It may be expensive to us, but it will certainly be beneficial to them. It would be more expensive not to do it, by losing our standing and character among the nations of the world in backing down from obligations we have undertaken.

How sensitive the people of the United States are about their character, about their honor! See what we have done with Cuba. After the millions of money spent and the lives lost in procuring the liberty of the Cubans, we consented to give them their independence. See what the word of the United States is worth! Keeping that pledge makes us admired by all the world. It is a higher plane than that upon which other nations have stood.

IT MAKES THE WHOLE WORLD ADMIRE AND RESPECT US, and the keeping of our pledge to establish law and order and protect life and property in the Philippines will make us further respected. The United States can not do a dishonorable thing. The people are proud, prosperous, progressive, and the world admires the strict honor with which we keep all our obligations. We have these obligations resting upon us. Whether or not we regret it, makes no difference.

Many men regret that we agreed to give up Cuba, but what American would say, after we made the pledge, that we should not redeem the pledge?

What American dares suggest the violation of one pledge that this great Government has ever made? And if there is any solemn pledge it has ever made, then the pledge to establish law and order and to protect life and property of natives and foreigners alike in the Philippines made by this Government in the treaty with Spain is a solemn one. It has been carried out with fidelity, and will continue so to the end. We would blush to say that this great Government had undertaken to do what it can not accomplish. We are not going to blush. It is going to be done, and we will all be proud of it.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the Senator to say he approved of the land provision. I want to know if he approves of the provision which allows corporations to have 5,000 acres of land?

Mr. STEWART. That quantity may be a little excessive.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a further question, as he has some acquaintance with the Tropics. I am not asking this for the purpose of criticising the bill, but to see if we can not arrive at something proper. I ask him whether 160 acres is not more than ought to be given to an individual in tropical countries, where such different conditions prevail from those that exist here; whether that is not too much? What does the Senator think about it?

Mr. STEWART. One hundred and sixty acres in a tropical country is probably as much as four times that amount would be in a northern climate.

Mr. TELLER. Even more than that.

Mr. STEWART. Yes; because a very small piece of land there will produce enormously. I have been in the Tropics and have seen the production, and it is perfectly astonishing what they can produce of their products, either sugar or tobacco or anything that will grow there. It grows very luxuriantly, but it requires a good deal of labor to attend to it, unless it be sugar cane. That grows naturally in many places, and bananas also grow naturally; but the Tropics are enormously productive. The digging of the soil is miasmatic and unhealthy, but the soil is wonderfully productive. I think 160 acres is enough.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I merely wish to call the attention of the committee for a moment to a provision of the bill. I am not going to make a speech, but I think it is one of the defects of the measure. I think to give 160 acres in the Philippines is more than to give every settler in the United States a section of land; that is, it is more in proportion. The holdings in all the Tropics are small. I wish to read just a brief statement by Sir George Baden-Powell and Sir William Crossman in a report of the royal commission, made perhaps a couple of years ago in reference to Jamaica, a British island. They estimate that thirty days' labor on an acre of good land in Jamaica will, in addition to providing a family with food for a year, yield a surplus available in the market of from £10 to £30.

That is the statement made as to 1 acre of good Jamaica land, that it will support a family and produce salable products of the value of from £10 to £30—from $50 to $150—in addition. That, of course, we know has been one of the reasons why the tropical people have stood still in their civilization. It is so easy to live that they do not exert themselves.

Jamaica is not a richer country than the Philippines, in great part. Of course, the mountains of Jamaica would not probably produce that much. Neither would the mountains of the Philippines; but there is a great quantity of good land in the Philippine Islands, and no man there can cultivate 160 acres. I should suppose that 10 acres there would be equal to 160 acres, certainly, on our farms.

Mr. LODGE. The language of the bill, I think, is "not exceeding 160 acres."

Mr. TELLER. I know; but I think we ought to limit it.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to ask the Senator what he thinks would be a proper limit. I see clearly the force of his objection.

Mr. TELLER. I think 10 acres are enough for any holding over there, as near as I can learn. There may be some land of which they should be allowed more, because it may not be all arable land in the mountains.

Mr. LODGE. We took the usual American amount.

Mr. TELLER. I will simply say to the committee that it seems to me a very large discretion ought to be given to the authorities over there in the matter, but the amount should still be fixed so as not to exceed a limited number of acres—40 acres, or something like that.

Mr. LODGE. I am not perfectly sure, as I am speaking from memory, but I think the Commission suggested 40 acres as the limit.

Mr. TELLER. I do not remember anything about it.

Mr. LODGE. I think those are the figures they suggested.

Mr. TELLER. Any native who has 40 acres of good land would be very rich; that is, his ability to get a living would be very well provided for. I believe there ought to be some amendment with reference to that.

Mr. LODGE. I am inclined to think it would be better to reduce the limit myself.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the limit in the bill?

Mr. LODGE. One hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. TELLER. One hundred and sixty acres. I think that is too much.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the homestead should be limited to 40 acres, so as to conform to the provisions that are in vogue in the Department here, and that the provision in regard to 5,000 acres for corporations should be reduced to about 500, in order to conform to the law as it exists in Porto Rico. I simply offer that as a suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that I think the suggestion in regard to the limitation of the amount of one holding of land is a very judicious one. I am inclined to think the committee put too high a limit on the amount.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is, on the individual holdings.

Mr. LODGE. On the individual holdings. The matter of corporations is a matter that the committee should consider very carefully as to whether there should be any change made there.

While I am on the floor, Mr. President, I want to say a single word about the coinage provisions. From the questions asked by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] it seemed to me there was some misapprehension about them. We have made no change in the standard of the Philippine Islands. Their standard is a silver standard, with the free coinage of the Mexican dollar—that is, the Mexican dollar can be imported there in any amount, and the Mexican dollar is the unit of their coinage. There are about 6,000,000 Spanish-Filipino dollars, as they are called, coined some time ago by Spain, which are of an inferior fineness and therefore incapable of export. They had there a subsidiary coinage consisting of Spanish coins, both silver and copper. Those subsidiary coins, being Spanish, had a larger value in Spain than they had in the Philippine Islands, and were practically all drained out back to Spain, so that the islands are in great need of a subsidiary coinage, both of silver and copper. That the bill provides.

Now, all we attempt to do in this bill is to maintain the existing standard—to substitute for the Mexican dollar, which is of inferior coinage and many of which are greatly worn, a finely minted American-Filipino dollar, coined at our own mint. The suggestion of that dollar is taken from what is known as the English-Bombay dollar, which was coined by England for use in the Straits Settlements and Hongkong and Singapore, which are all silver-using cities and countries. The English dollar, well coined, passes by tael, as a dollar coined by us would undoubtedly do, whereas the Mexican dollar is so inferior in coinage and much of it is so much worn that it passes only by weight.

The coinage of the Bombay dollar was so successful for the Chinese trade that in the six years—I think it is six years—England has been coining it she has coined 110,000,000, and those have all, or the great mass of them, made their way into China and have been used in the trade with that country with great advantage to English commerce.

The committee felt, first, that it was unwise at this time to suddenly change the money standard to which the people of those islands had always been accustomed; that it would involve a great alteration in prices and wages, and would be attended with all the risks and perils with which the change of a money standard is always attended. They also felt that it was absolutely necessary to supply the islands with a good subsidiary coinage, about which I think there is no dispute, and it seemed to them it was equally necessary to give them a good silver dollar, and that we might as well replace the Mexican dollar with the American dollar, which could be used in the oriental trade in China like the Bombay dollar.

Therefore, taking the Bombay dollar as a type of what was wanted, the committee provided for the impression to be made upon it and the inscription after the manner of the British order-in-council for the Bombay dollar. That order-in-council provided that there should be on the reverse of the dollar the statement in Chinese, English, and Malay of the value of the coin, together with a Chinese device in the center. That enabled the coin to circulate throughout the Orient. There are, of course, many Malay dialects in the Straits Settlements for which this dollar was primarily coined, just as there are very many dialects in the Philippine Islands; and using the term "Filipino" is as vague as using the term "Malay" in the British order-in-council. The intention was, however, merely to get some sign or device which would be as nearly as possible comprehensive to the people of the islands.

The Chinese inscription of course was with a view to the use of these dollars in the Empire of China, where they will undoubtedly go in considerable quantities as trade progresses, and the committee felt that in this way they would not only give the Philippine Islands the coins which they now need very much, but that they would establish there a dollar which would be of great advantage to American commerce in the Orient.

The other plan was to substitute a modified form of the gold standard. I say a modified form because it provided for the coinage of the peso, or Filipino dollar, which would be under weight and of inferior fineness, so that it would not leave the islands. It may be in the future desirable to put the Philippine Islands upon the gold standard, but the committee were very clear that that time had not yet arrived, and that it would be a mistake at the present time to attempt it.

Spain attempted once or twice, unless I am misinformed, to establish the gold standard in the Philippine Islands, but she proved unable to maintain it there, and all the gold which she introduced into the Philippine Islands went out, leaving the islands as they had been—on the silver standard.

Mr. SPOONER. It went out and stayed out.

Mr. LODGE. It went out, the Senator from Wisconsin says, and stayed out. The last time, I think, was more than twenty years ago, when some Spanish gold was brought in there.

The committee felt that if an attempt was made to impose the gold standard upon those islands at this time it would be necessary for the United States to undertake the maintenance of a gold reserve. They saw no other way to do it. Taking all these considerations together, the great responsibility of undertaking to maintain a gold standard in those islands, the change in the existing system, which was involved with all possible perils, the committee felt that the safe and wise thing to do was, for the present at least, to leave the islands on the silver standard, to which they had always been accustomed.

It was represented to the committee that placing it on the gold standard would improve the trade of the islands with the gold-standard countries; but all the world trades with China, with the Straits Settlements, with Singapore and Hongkong, on the silver standard. The Philippine Islands form part of that monetary system, and only a small part, and it did not seem to the committee that there would be any very great advantage in making a change as to the Philippine Islands, but that on the contrary the balance of advantage would probably be in leaving the Philippine Islands as a part of the same monetary system to which they had already belonged.

Therefore, to repeat what I said at the beginning, we make no change in the money standard of the islands. We leave it as it was. We simply give them what they greatly need and of which they are now destitute—a good subsidiary coinage, both of copper and silver—and instead of the free coinage of Mexican dollars, now the unit of value, we substitute for it a Filipino-American dollar, well coined, well made, which we believe will not only furnish them with a good dollar which will pass by tael and not by weight, but which will enter into all the commerce of the Orient, especially China, and will perform the same useful office for us that the Bombay dollar has performed in China for the commerce of England.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I understand that this proposition meets with the approval of the people who have been most experienced in the trade of that section of the world, who gave this their approval. Is that the fact?

Mr. LODGE. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. The subcommittee, of which I was not a member, but which allowed me to be present at the hearings, at some of which the Senator from Colorado was also present, heard the representative of the Hongkong and Shanghai bank; they heard Mr. Forbes, who for more than twenty years was the managing partner of the great American house of Russell & Co., in China—not bankers, but a trading company; and they heard Mr. Macy, a large tea merchant, in regard to the conditions of commerce in the East. They were all unanimous in the opinion that in the interest of American commerce in China and in the East generally, there was nothing to be gained by making a change in the standard of money in the Philippine Islands. That is wholly apart from the consideration of the dangers involved always in a change of the money standard.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And much would be lost?

Mr. LODGE. And that much would be lost in attempting the change. We also heard from Mr. Conant, who had been sent out by the War Department to investigate this subject. He made a very able and elaborate presentation to the committee of the plan of substituting a modified form of the gold standard for the silver standard now in use in the islands. The subcommittee, however, and I think the full committee, became satisfied, after hearing all this evidence, that the opinion of the men actually engaged in oriental commerce was correct, and that it was better under existing conditions, and with a view especially to the market of China, that we should maintain the existing standard in the Philippine Islands, to give them a dollar which would play the same part that the English-Bombay dollar has played in the Chinese trade.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, I ask him if it is not true also that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] was present at the hearings, and these gentlemen convinced the committee that it would be difficult, to say the least, if not impossible, for us to maintain the gold standard there?

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator from Idaho reminds me, Senator ALDRICH was present at the hearings also, as well as the Senator from Colorado. I know I went to those hearings with my inclination toward the substitution of the gold standard, and I think we were all convinced——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was unanimous.

Mr. LODGE. Including the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Colorado. I think we were all convinced after hearing these things from the merchants of the East that the only thing to do was to adopt the plan which the committee finally agreed upon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yesterday unanimous consent was had that immediately after the routine business on Thursday morning we should proceed to take a vote upon the bill known as the union railroad station bill. In view of the short time in which we shall have to debate that very important question, I think I am justified in asking the Senator from Massachusetts if he will not consent to have the unfinished business temporarily laid aside that we may take up the railroad bill.

Mr. LODGE. I, of course, am extremely anxious to get on with this bill. I want to have the debate continued until all Senators have spoken who desire to speak. I do not like to lay aside the bill if it is possible to continue the debate.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There does not seem to be anyone disposed to go on.

Mr. LODGE. I gave notice that I would move to-day that the Senate to-morrow and on subsequent days until the bill was disposed of shall meet at 11 o'clock. I am extremely averse to making that motion. I know how much inconvenience it causes to Senators in the committee work. From what has been said to me by Senators in committee and in private conversation, I am in hopes that we may soon reach a conclusion upon this bill.

I do not mean any assurance as to a particular day, but if I could have some general assurance as to the possibility of bringing the bill to a vote I should be very glad to withhold the motion. I do not desire to make it. From what Senators upon the other side have said to me I am led to believe that there was no disposition to have anything but a full and fair debate, and to allow the subject to come to a vote at the earliest reasonable moment compatible with full debate. Of course I should be glad to fix a day, if Senators would be willing to name any day, on which we can have a vote. But in any event, Mr. President, I will not press the motion to-day, because I am in hopes that some arrangement may be come to which will enable us to close the debate within a reasonable time. If there is no one else who desires to go on with the discussion this afternoon, then of course I would be very glad to yield to the Senator from North Dakota, as I am anxious that we shall get that bill out of the way.

Then, Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent that the railroad bill may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. He also asks that the bill known as the union station bill be laid before the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

UNION RAILROAD STATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I have never heretofore taken any part in the debate in regard to matters which pertain to the District of Columbia, and I have never had the time nor the disposition. I am not sufficiently familiar with the District affairs to discuss many of the measures which come before the Senate in a way that would be intelligent. But upon the statement yesterday evening of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] it struck me that this bill was so absolutely unreasonable from every point of view, so inexcusable, and such little reason given why the bill should pass, as reported by the committee, that I made certain inquiries of him in regard to the objects and purposes and the consideration that the Government was to receive for the large amount of money proposed to be given to this railroad corporation. It may be that I take an exaggerated view of the matter, but to me it is absolutely not to be explained by anything that I have heard heretofore why this Government should make an absolute donation of $4,600,000. I think it is admitted and claimed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] to be between six and seven million dollars.

As I understand the proposition, the Pennsylvania Railroad, since 1871, perhaps, has occupied certain lands belonging to the Government. I think the road has never paid any rent or anything to the Government for that land. A year and a half ago a bill was passed providing that they should have the use of other land belonging to the Government to extend and build a new depot. That land was estimated, I think, to be worth a million and a half of dollars. Now the Senator from New Hampshire yesterday (and I called his special attention to it when I asked him the question) said the consideration was the removal of the grade crossings. I asked him if another consideration was not that this railroad company was to erect a new depot on this new land that the Government was to give them, or give them the use of. He said no, it was the removal of the grade crossings. I have looked at the bill which passed a year and a half ago and I find in that bill the following provision:

> The station buildings to be erected on the Mall shall cost not less than $1,500,000.

Now, that is the consideration stated in the act, and yet the railroad has expended no money. The conditions are precisely the same. The act of a year and a half ago provides substantially that Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the law. There has been nothing whatever to prevent the Congress of the United States to-day from repealing that act. There can be no claim of justice or that any other equities have arisen because nothing has been done and no expenses incurred. Yet instead of repealing that act, if it is desired to establish the depot at another point, this bill proposes to give the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad $3,000,000 and to provide for the expenditure of $1,600,000 more.

Now, why should we give them $3,000,000 for this privilege that we granted them a year and a half ago to build this station on that ground? Can any man give a reason why we owe the Pennsylvania road $1,500,000 in order to get them to relinquish this right when the law itself says that Congress has the right to repeal it? They have expended nothing. It was a grant to them by Congress for the use of this land, and yet in the bill now pending it is proposed that we shall give $1,500,000 to that railroad, $1,500,000 to the Baltimore and Ohio, and $1,600,000 for improvements to be made on the new depot.

Is that a fair proposition? Why should we do this? Will the Senator from New Hampshire tell us why, instead of repealing this law, as was reserved the right to do, when no expense to the railroad has been incurred on account of it, the Government of the United States should appropriate out of its Treasury $4,600,000 and give to this immensely wealthy corporation to-day——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator did not think it perhaps well to allude to me, I would not interrupt him.

Mr. BERRY. I would be glad to be interrupted if the Senator desires to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that not only does the railroad company give back the land that was given last year, but likewise removes the depot and all their buildings from the Mall, and that reverts to the Government of the United States. I wish to say, furthermore, to the Senator—the Senator, I have no doubt, wants to be fair about this matter——

Mr. BERRY. I do if I know it.

Mr. GALLINGER. This proposition is a simple one. One of three things can be done. We can go into the matter of municipal ownership; we can pass this bill granting these corporations precisely the amount of money that we pledged them in the bills that are now laws, or we can refuse to do that, and they will proceed under existing laws to construct two stations, one of which will be on the Mall.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Not if we repeal the law.

Mr. BERRY. Not if the law is repealed. They have incurred no expense under it. It was a grant authorizing them to do it in consideration of their erecting a building there. One of the considerations was $1,500,000. They have not built it.

Mr. GALLINGER. They have incurred expense. They have their building there now. In 1871 Congress asked the Pennsylvania Railroad to come into the District.

Mr. BERRY. Does the Senator mean to say that they have incurred expense since the passage of the act?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. BERRY. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. GALLINGER. Simply because the committee has asked them not to do it pending the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BERRY. That is the truth.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will not put me in a false attitude.

Mr. BERRY. I do not desire to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. In 1871 Congress asked the Pennsylvania Railroad to come into the District of Columbia. Congress gave them a site south of Virginia avenue. Before they had built on that Congress changed its mind and gave them the site where their railroad station now stands. They constructed that station. They put up their train sheds. They have paid taxes on that land for thirty-one or thirty-two years. The Senator says they can be dispossessed. Perhaps they can. Will Congress do it? Does the Senator believe Congress will do it? I do not believe the Senator thinks Congress will do that thing.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator is through, I will tell him what I think about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not quite through, Mr. President.

Now, the Senator will not put the committee in the attitude of giving away six or seven million dollars. The committee in its wisdom, and Congress in its wisdom, a year and a half ago, for the purpose of eliminating the grade crossings in the District of Columbia, did make a donation of a million and a half in money to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and gave the Pennsylvania Railroad certain lands. Those three millions are to-day appropriated, and this bill appropriates not one single cent additional, except $1,670,000, which the Government and the District of Columbia are asked to expend to improve the streets and to pay damages around the proposed new railroad station, which it is their very manifest duty to do. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the Senator says, and only repeats what he said yesterday, that the only consideration for the passage of the bill a year and a half ago was to remove the grade crossings. Now, I assert that the bill itself says that in consideration of that the Pennsylvania Railroad undertook to erect a station on the Mall worth $1,500,000, and it is in the law. That is a part of the consideration, Mr. President, for this grant of $1,500,000.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. BERRY. Let me get through with my statement and then I will hear the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not going to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BERRY. I repeat, that building has not been erected. The Senator seeks to go back to the act of 1871 to evade the force of what I said in reference to the last act. I repeat, Mr. President, that under that act it is proposed to give them $1,500,000 in consideration of the removal of certain grade crossings and the further consideration that they will erect a station worth $1,500,000. They have incurred no expense whatever up to this time since the passage of that act. The law itself says that Congress may repeal it. Congress may repeal it to-day, and they are not injured. Nor can it be claimed that they have been unfairly dealt with.

I repeat, that we in the pending bill are giving them $1,500,000 for the Pennsylvania, $1,500,000 for the Baltimore and Ohio, and $1,600,000, that is admitted; and it is claimed by the Senator from North Dakota to amount to more than $6,000,000 altogether to be given for the improvements that are to be made.

Now, tell me, Mr. President, why should we do this thing? In every railroad that is built throughout the country where they are compelled to go into cities they have to pay for the right of way. They have to pay for their own depot. They have to keep the grade crossings in such a manner as to not endanger the lives of the people. They do it in every other city.

Ah, but the Senator said yesterday that in some of the Northern cities the towns have contributed something to remove grade crossings. I have no doubt but that is true. Mr. President, cities throughout this country have done a good many things in regard to granting privileges to railroads and corporations and granting franchises that have not been approved by the country or by the people or the cities in which they were done. I say that that is no precedent that we should follow here.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will promise not to interrupt him again while he is making his speech, and if what he says needs an answer I will make the answer in my own time.

Mr. BERRY. All right.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator says that this corporation promised to erect a station costing a million and a half dollars, which is true. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad obligated itself to erect a station costing I think, $750,000, which would be $2,225,000, for which they get this donation, as the Senator chooses to call it, of $3,000,000. That donation is continued. The Pennsylvania and the Baltimore and Ohio railroads have obligated themselves to construct a station worth $5,000,000. They have obligated themselves to build a tunnel so that the roads from the Senator's country can pass into this magnificent union station that will cost $1,700,000. So the corporations are going to expend more than twice what they obligated themselves to expend on these two stations, which the Senator says have not been built. That is all I care to say on that point.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from New Hampshire continually evades the proposition by claiming now that unless we do this they can go on and erect these buildings.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly, they can.

Mr. BERRY. I answer that by saying that we can repeal the law to-day, and the law expressly provides——

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will excuse me, I will yield a little later. The law provides that it may be repealed, and it is no excuse for Congress to say to-day that we have to do this, otherwise they would do something else in regard to the Mall that Congress does not want done. Why should we give them, I repeat, this $4,600,000?

The roads are running here for their own profit. In every part of the country they are required to pay for the right of way, and they are required to build their own stations. If I am not misinformed about the magnificent union depot at St. Louis, it was paid for by the railroads. It was never claimed that it ought to be paid for by the city, and neither the city of St. Louis nor the State of Missouri, I think, ever gave them money to build it. Upon the contrary, they were compelled to pay for the right of way through that city wherever they desired to use the streets or the public property of the city. Yet here to-day we are confronted by a bill which proposes to give this great corporation, for it is all practically one—the Pennsylvania Railroad—$1,600,000 more, and then it is claimed an additional amount to pay for damages.

Now, why should we give this money to this great corporation, Mr. President? It is their business to build these stations. They are for their profits. They run these railroads in here because it pays them to run them, and why should the Government of the United States give them this money? It will not do to claim it was because Congress made a mistake a year and a half ago and made these promises, because nothing has been done under that contract. It can be repealed, I repeat, to-day, and we owe them nothing. We do not owe them a million and a half dollars because Congress promised to give them land valued at that much money.

I submit, Mr. President, I should be glad to see a union station built here, if built properly; but I can never consent, nor can I see how Senators on this floor can vote, to take money out of the public Treasury and absolutely make a gift of it to this corporation, which is already immensely wealthy.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BERRY. I will yield the floor to the Senator if he desires it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not wish to take the floor at this time, but I understand that other Senators desire to speak on this subject. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the fact that in the statement which I had inserted in the RECORD yesterday, prepared by the railroad committee of the Board of Trade of this city, composed of eminent business men, this statement is made with respect to the actual amount of money which the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia are to expend or are to donate to this corporation. The statement reads as follows:

> It also proposes that the railroads be given $6,792,521 for making the alterations in their terminals, of which amount the District of Columbia is to pay $2,804,000, as follows—

Then these gentlemen have gone on here and itemized this statement:

> One million six hundred thousand dollars for the plaza in front of the depot.

That is admitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. Not that the District is to pay it. I do not admit that. I admit the District is to pay half of it and the Government to pay half.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In this report it is all charged to the District.

Mr. GALLINGER. That shows they do not know what they are talking about.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Possibly not. The report continues:

One hundred and seventy thousand dollars for changes in South Washington, paving, and damage to property, $750,000 bonus to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and $284,000 as its half of the cost of the highway bridge.

The statement proceeds further:

The $1,454,000 given in real estate is largely in streets closed, which belong to the United States, but are a loss to the citizens of the District rather than the United States. The right of way for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad through the Reform-School grounds is a loss to a District institution, unestimated in any of the reports, and the damage to property abutting on streets closed by the bill is entirely unprovided for and must fall on the owners, citizens of the District.

Here is another statement from this report which, it seems to me, is worthy of consideration:

The cost of the highway bridge, if properly constructed, is estimated by the War Department to be $906,000, instead of the $568,000 already appropriated.

We have appropriated $568,000 in the act passed in 1901 for the construction of a highway bridge. The report then continues:

So that the estimated cost to the District is too little in this instance and may be too small in other particulars. It is probable that the District contribution to the railroad improvements will not be less than $4,000,000.

That is the District alone.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, not having been present during all this discussion, I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota, for my information, whether Congress can compel the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to remove their depots from where they are at present situated without compensating them.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Of course, that is a question that the Senator from Connecticut is much better able to decide than I am able to decide it. It involves a legal question, and we all know the Senator is a great lawyer, and he ought to know.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not know anything about the facts; I do not know how the railroad companies acquired the right to put their depot buildings and sheds where they are, and I do not know what the terms are.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. My understanding is that in 1871 the then city council of the city of Washington was asked by the railroad company for the privilege of entering the city. That request was granted by the then existing council, and the railroad came into the District. I believe that is the history of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that the citizens of the District petitioned the railroad company to come into the city and gave them a location just south of Virginia avenue, and afterwards the location where they are now situated.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is correct, I think. The city council, which was then in existence, had charge of such matters at the time; but since then the railroad companies have been coming in, and gradually, but steadily, encroaching upon the city of Washington, giving us a fair service, for which the people of Washington have paid—there is no dispute as to that—until now they propose to continue their encroachments and bore a hole through the middle of this Capitol Hill, within 50 feet of the place where the great Library building is located, and to run their trains through that, so that the road completely crosses the city.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator will permit me, the reason of my inquiry is this: I suppose that everyone will admit the desirability of a union station——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do, certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But the question as to which I desire information is whether we can take these railroads by the throat and say, "Remove your depots and build a union station," without paying them any money. Can we do that? That is what I want to get at.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the Senator will agree with me that these railroad companies have no grants of these lands; that they are mere tenants at will, and that what we have been giving them has been in the nature of an easement—that is all—because we have always added a section at the conclusion of every one of these railroad acts which has been passed that "Congress hereby reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act." Now, if we had granted to the railroad company anything beyond a mere easement—a mere right to use the land—if we had given them a title to this land, we could not repeal the act. I submit that to the Senator as a lawyer.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I was going to say to the Senator from North Dakota that it appears to me, while his contention is strictly in accordance with the law, there are certainly equities here. The railroad company has occupied the land, of course as a kind of tenant at will or as a matter of benefit to itself mainly; but it has built a depot there, and while undoubtedly Congress can say, "We have given you a great deal all these years, because we let you have all this land without paying any money for it," still the question of equity would come in as to whether we can say to them, "Now, get out," and they lose their depot building. That is the only point I can see that the Senator from Connecticut could hinge any argument on in behalf of the railroad company.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will permit me, it is not a proposition that the railroad company shall vacate the property they now occupy; it is not a proposition to compel them to build a union station. They desire, indeed they prefer, and probably, from the necessities of the case, they will in a short time be compelled to have greater depot facilities than they have at present. There is no proposition here upon the part of the Government to force them to vacate the land they have occupied for thirty years without paying rent. That is not the proposition. The proposition is for this Government to build for them a union station, or to contribute toward that purpose some six or seven million dollars, as stated by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. A part of this is to be paid by the Government, and the greater part, I think, and some of it is to be paid by the District of Columbia.

I contend that it is inexcusable that the railroad company should ask the Government for or that the Government should for one moment think of giving them money to build for them more comfortable quarters and more desirable to them, to build for them a great union station. Why should we give them the money? That is what I want to know. When we ask this question, we are told in reply that we passed a law eighteen months ago, and that if we do not give them this money they will go on under that law and erect a station; but it turns out that under that law they have incurred no expense, and no equities whatever have arisen under that act. It could be repealed to-day without injury to anybody, and yet we are told that because we did make that grant of an easement, or whatever you may call it, we must therefore take some $4,600,000 and donate it to these two companies. That is the proposition.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator misunderstood my position. I was answering a question of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] in regard to compelling the railroad companies to leave their present depots. I was not saying anything about the act which was passed here a year or so ago, giving them the right to enlarge their present terminal facilities, to do away with grade crossings, and leaving the buildings they now occupy, and all that kind of thing, because under that act they have done nothing. Therefore they have no claim to equity on that score at all. The only claim they can put up here would be one for having to give up their present station buildings on Sixth street and to go somewhere else. Then they might say, "We have built this great structure here, costing two or three or four or five hundred thousand dollars"—I do not know how much—"our tracks, etc.; you are depriving us of the structures which you asked us to build, and you certainly ought not to take our property without giving us something for it."

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not think that this Government, after the expenditure it has made in the construction of the Library and the Capitol here, can afford to allow these two depots to remain where they are. They mar the appearance of the city, and I do not think we can afford to allow them to stay.

The structure that is proposed is a very different character of structure than the railroad companies would build for themselves. They would not erect any such monumental buildings as are proposed. Here, however, the demand was made upon them to make the buildings correspond with the Library, the Capitol, and with the grounds here, and to put it in a place where the whole thing would be in harmony. I think Congress ought to see to it that the surroundings of this Capitol are in harmony with it. The depot down here mars the whole appearance of this end of the city. We can not continue to have it in that way. It has got to be changed.

I think there is a good deal in the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that the Government ought to pay a much larger proportion than one-half of the expense involved. I think it is one of the things you should take into account that this city as a city, without having regard for this Capitol, would not think of contributing to build such a structure as this is to be.

We have spent a good deal of money for the beautification of this city. A building for the Library, to contain all the books that are, there could have been constructed just as well as the present structure for less than half the money, probably for one-fourth the money, the present building has cost. But the building is right here adjoining the Capitol, and so it was determined that a building for the Library should be erected which would be the pride of the nation.

I think there is nothing that so mars the whole situation as these depots, the one on the Mall and the one right down here, cutting off access in that direction between the Printing Office and the Capitol. Every person who comes to this city and views its magnificent buildings and grounds is shocked by some of the surroundings. They ought to be made attractive.

I do not think we ought to allow these improvements to go on as proposed in the bill of last year. It is said that we can now repeal that bill. Certainly we can if we want to do so, and if we do not take some such action as is now proposed we will have a structure there that nobody wants to have. When men of taste examine these structures they say they are eyesores. The Commission which laid out the plans for greater Washington has said that these depots mar the entire situation, and that they should be removed. I have nothing to do with that. I am not on the subcommittee, but the chairman of the committee has been negotiating with the railroad companies for some time to get their consent to this project. So far as they are concerned, it will be cheaper for them to stay where they are and make only such improvements as are necessary than it will be to erect this great structure—a building that is to be longer than the entire Capitol.

Mr. HANNA. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. HANNA. Is it not true that the Committee on the District of Columbia asked the railroad companies to change their plans, and not that the railroad companies came and demanded the change?

Mr. STEWART. The request came from the committee.

Mr. HANNA. And is it not true that the railroad companies were perfectly satisfied to go ahead under the law of a year and a half ago?

Mr. GALLINGER. They would rather do so.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly that is true. As the Senator from New Hampshire says, they would rather do so now.

The chairman of the committee talked with me about this matter, and I expressed my opinion to him that we could better afford to make some sacrifice than have all this end of the city and the Capitol marred by the continuance of these structures. All men who have traveled take this view. We are spending money to make this capital city what it ought to be; and these eyesores ought to be done away with. The railroad companies do not ask for this. They can get along very well with cheaper structures than those which are now proposed.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] says that the railroad companies do not desire this privilege. That to me is a remarkable statement, when this is a direct proposition to give them some $6,000,000 to build a depot, not as we built the Library, for the benefit of the people of the United States, but to build a depot for this railroad company to be their property; and yet the Senator seeks to make that appear the same as building the Library, which, as I have said, was for the benefit of the people of the United States, and is the property of the United States, and yet he tells us that this railroad company does not desire it.

The Senator says that the law can be repealed by which we promised to give the railroad company $3,000,000 two years ago. That law ought never to have been passed. The Senator admits that that law can be repealed, but he says it will not be repealed. Why will it not be repealed? It will not be repealed because the the majority of this Senate and of the other House will not vote for its repeal when they know it ought to be repealed before any injury shall come.

You say the passage of that act was a great mistake. Then, if so, why should we not repeal it? You do not pretend that there is any injury to come to anybody by its repeal—that we should be in the same position we were before the act was passed? We have a right to repeal it. You admit it was a bad law, and yet you stand here upon the floor of the Senate and say that Congress will not repeal it. Then let Senators tell the country why Congress will not do it.

Mr. STEWART. All right.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEWART. I want to reply to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

The repeal of that act would not put us in any better position than we now are. It would not remove the nuisance. We tried at the last session to get the Baltimore and Ohio depot put back a little farther and to arrange things in such a way that it would not be so uncomely. We made a mistake in doing that, and I do not think we accomplished what we desired. The Baltimore and Ohio depot here is a disgrace to the city, and if the other depot is to remain where it is, we would be without any suitable arrangements for depots in this city.

We want depot buildings of a better character. The plan now is that the railroad companies shall erect a building longer than this Capitol. We required them to put in the description of the buildings they would erect to correspond in an architectural point of view with the public buildings at the capital. All this has been done; and the repeal of that act would leave us in a worse condition than we were before we passed the other act. Do we want these depots always to remain where they are?

I know that all these acts contain a provision reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal; but no court would allow that to be done without our making compensation. If you require a railroad company to put up a depot building and provide that they must make a certain expenditure in doing so, and they have done that, are transacting their business there, no court would say that Congress could repeal such an act without making compensation to the company for the damage done them. Of course the power to alter, amend, or repeal is retained, but the railroad companies have acted upon the provisions of the bill, and they have expended their money——

Mr. BERRY. They have not acted on the former law.

Mr. STEWART. They have acted on the former one. If we want to have suitable terminal facilities in this city and to have railroad stations that will be an ornament to the capital city and in harmony with the great Government structures here, we should promptly pass this bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that instead of donating and giving this subsidy—for it may be called a subsidy, I think, or whatever it is—to a railroad company of six or seven million dollars, or any other sum, it would be far better for Congress to authorize the District of Columbia to itself build this monumental station. We all want a monumental station. Now, would it not be a far better business project for the District of Columbia to do this and charge the railroad companies for the accommodation that they would be obliged to have here, and thus repay the debt within thirty or forty years?

Why is not that a better business proposition than to make a free gift of this six or seven million dollars to the railroad companies?

Mr. STEWART. If you built that union station you could not remove their present depots from where they are without you let them come in free. So you would not get very much out of it. Perhaps the court would say if you provided another place for them with better accommodations, that might be equitable, but you would have to allow them to come in practically for nothing.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will ask the Senator why it is that in the city of Boston, which built a subway, through which the electric roads run, which cost the city $5,000,000, and they are receiving a return of about 5 per cent on that investment, which pays interest on the bonds and provides a suitable sinking fund to discharge the debt. Is not that a good business proposition?

Mr. STEWART. I do not know what is the situation or what are the facts there, but I do know that the railroads could not get into those streets, and so it became necessary for the railroads to have a subway, and they readily consented to it. I have not been in Boston for several years, but I know the conditions that formerly prevailed there.

Mr. GALLINGER. And they have some pretty heavy damage suits on hand that will take off their dividends.

Mr. STEWART. They can not go through the streets, and of course they consented to use the subway.

But you can not make the exchange which is talked of here without the consent of the railroad companies, and I think that would be a harder bargain and cost the District much more money than the arrangement made through the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. MCMILLAN], who is a very good business man and a good railroad man.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator would rather give the money outright and let the railroad company take charge of the railroad facilities of the District for all time?

Mr. STEWART. It is not giving it outright. The situation, I think, is very much exaggerated. I do not know as to the figures, but the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I suppose, has got the figures. The railroad companies are putting out a great deal more money than they would do if they were building a depot in an ordinary town, where it was not necessary to erect monumental buildings, but they have some patriotic motive in this thing. They do not for their purposes have to erect such buildings as those now proposed. If the Government and the city will do their portion, the railroad companies have consented to carry out a plan which will correspond to the buildings here, and I think that is a fair proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will not occupy many minutes in the further discussion of this bill. I believe it was Mark Twain who said "It is better not to know so much than it is to know so much that is not so," and as I have listened to the discussion of the bill I have come to the conclusion that our witty friend was right in that observation.

It seems to me that the propositions included in this measure are very simple and easy of comprehension. I will endeavor to restate two or three of them, and then will allow the opponents of the bill to occupy the time for the remainder of the day.

In 1871, or thereabouts, the people of the District of Columbia, thinking they were oppressed by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, petitioned the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to come into the District of Columbia. As an inducement for them to come here, they granted them the privilege of building a station, sheds, etc., south of Virginia avenue. Previous to that time the municipal government of the District had taken action, I think, or certainly they did so a short time afterwards. It was then thought desirable that the railroad station should be built not south of Virginia avenue, but on the site that is occupied at the present time by the Baltimore and Potomac road. That was thirty-one years ago. That railroad came here by invitation and, accepting the grant of land, constructed their station. I do not argue that it was an absolute grant of land so far as deeding it away to the road was concerned, but, accepting that grant of land, they constructed their station. They have occupied it uninterruptedly for thirty-one years, paying taxes on it. That is the situation, or was the situation, a year and a half ago.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a question there?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator says they have paid taxes on it. Does he intend to say that they have paid taxes on the land or on the building?

Mr. GALLINGER. On the building, of course.

Mr. BERRY. Nothing on the land?

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume not. The Government does not pay taxes on its own land, and the Government owns half of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator will permit me one moment. That is certainly true, but I thought from the Senator's argument he was insisting that the railroad company had title to the land.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have never said so in my life.

Mr. BERRY. It was simply a right to build there and nothing more.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did say in debate formerly that I had an impression they had that right, but I afterwards said, upon examination, that I changed my mind on that point. I have been absolutely frank about this matter. They have occupied that place for thirty-one years uninterruptedly. The matter has been discussed over and over again in Congress, and it has always been asserted they were there by sufferance, but no serious effort has ever been made to dispossess them.

A year and a half ago, Mr. President, we not only conceded their right to remain there, but we granted them further favors by giving them additional land for the purpose of enlarging their plant, if you choose to call it so, and they to-day have the benefit of that legislation of a year and a half ago and can proceed to occupy still more of the Mall if they wish to do so. But the Committee on the District of Columbia, desiring to have a union station, requested the railroad corporations not to proceed under the statutes of a year and a half ago. Various conferences were held with railroad officials. They protested that they preferred the legislation as it exists to-day to the proposed legislation, but ultimately consented not to proceed under those statutes and to seriously consider the matter of a union station.

Mr. President, it is persistently stated here that we are making a contribution to build a railroad station for a railroad corporation. I say we are doing nothing of the kind. When this matter was up some two years ago the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia entered into an investigation as to what other cities were doing in the matter of the elimination of grade crossings. There was a demand in this District by the press and the people that these deadly grade crossings should be gotten rid of, and nobody suggested that the railroad corporations could be compelled at their own expense to get rid of the crossings. Communication was entered into with the officials of the various cities of the country, and the committee ascertained these facts——

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me one moment right there?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator asserted that no one contended that the railroad companies should be compelled at their own expense to get rid of these crossings.

Mr. GALLINGER. No one has undertaken to do it.

Mr. BERRY. Does the Senator say the Government can not compel them to do so?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have very serious doubts on that point.

Mr. BERRY. As to whether the Government can compel them to do it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have.

Mr. BERRY. I am astonished to hear him say so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the Senator insists the Government can do everything. The Senator insists that we can wipe out every right and every investment that these corporations have in the District of Columbia, and while I am forced to admit that the Government has that brute right the Government is not going to do it. That is all there is to it.

Mr. President, what did we ascertain? We ascertained that the city of Philadelphia, for the purpose of eliminating grade crossings on the Philadelphia and Trenton Railroad, a small corporation, paid $1,000,020, and the railroad company paid the balance. We found that in the city of New Haven one-half of the cost was paid. We found that by special act of the legislature of Massachusetts, providing for a change of grades, etc., on the Providence division of the Pennsylvania Railroad in the city of Boston, 55 per cent was paid by the railroad company and 45 per cent by the Commonwealth, the city of Boston being required to refund the State 30 per cent of the whole cost.

For similar changes in Brockton, Mass., including new stations, yards, tracks, etc., the railroad company paid 65 per cent, the State 25 per cent, and Brockton 10 per cent.

The law of the State of Massachusetts now provides that no matter from which side an application is made to abolish grade crossings, 65 per cent shall be paid by the railroad company, 25 per cent by the State, and 10 per cent by the municipality.

A recent law of the State of New York divides the cost of abolishing grade crossings as follows: 50 per cent by the railroad company, 25 per cent by the State, and 25 per cent by the municipality.

In a letter dated October 16, 1899, Mr. William Jackson, city engineer of Boston, states that in a special case involving an expenditure of $4,000,000 the State and the city of Boston paid 45 per cent (of which the city assumed 13.5) and the railroad company paid 55 per cent.

In a letter dated October 17, 1899, Mr. G. S. Webster, chief engineer of Philadelphia, states that in the construction of the Pennsylvania avenue subway whereby 16 grade crossings were abolished, involving an expenditure of $3,000,000, the city paid one-half and the Philadelphia and Reading Railway Company paid the other one-half.

Mr. President, the committee ascertained that in Rochester, in Pittsburg, and in other cities in the country substantially the same relative amounts were paid by the corporations and by the municipality, and it was upon that finding and upon that state of facts that the committee acted when they proposed that the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia should make a contribution toward the elimination of grade crossings in the District of Columbia. It was not for the purpose of building railroad stations, and no special pleading will contort the action of the committee into having recommended a proposition of that kind.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator insists on saying that the three millions of cash which we have appropriated is for the purpose of eliminating grade crossings. Now, I want to ask the Senator whether he believes that the elimination of grade crossings within the District of Columbia will cost the sum of $3,000,000?

Mr. GALLINGER. The committee thought so, and the District Commissioners think so, and if the Senator from North Dakota thinks otherwise it is a mere matter of opinion.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, right on that point, I think there are not more than 10 or 15 miles of road in the entire District. I refer to main lines, of course. If there is to be spent $3,000,000, it is an easy matter to estimate how much per mile it would cost. Does the Senator think it would cost $100,000 per mile or $150,000 per mile to eliminate the grade crossings?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think it would, and even more——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not.

Mr. GALLINGER. When we propose to construct viaducts to bring these roads in far above the grade in many instances, the Senator must give his figures before he can disprove any observations I make on that point.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The trouble with the Senator is that he has no figures except what have been supplied by the railroad company.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is one of these courteous things we meet with in the Senate Chamber sometimes, and I pass it by for what it is worth. The Senator has been exploiting a new theory here. We had the same thing exploited by the late Senator from South Dakota last year on these bills.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Then it is not new.

Mr. GALLINGER. And now we have the same thing exploited by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, that is wholly gratuitous.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a fact. The Senator a year and a half ago acted with the committee on the two bills that are on the statute book, and did not raise his voice in opposition to them. The present bill is precisely along the same line as those statutes. Now the Senator appears as a special champion of municipal ownership of a great union station in the city of Washington.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, the Senator knows full well how bills are handled in the Committee on the District of Columbia. As I stated yesterday, the chairman of that committee, the Senator from New Hampshire, and one other Senator composed the railroad subcommittee of that committee. Now, we have uniformly left these questions to that subcommittee. I want to say, Mr. President, the Senator having, perhaps unintentionally, reflected upon me in this matter, that with the immense duties that are on my hands in my own committee I can not watch everything in the Committee on the District of Columbia any more than the Senator from New Hampshire can watch them, because he has a great committee to attend to also, although I concede that he gives closer attention to District affairs than I have been able to give.

But, Mr. President, I want to say that I believe this bill, brought in here by the Committee on the District of Columbia, was not thoroughly understood by more than six Senators in this body, including the members of the committee, until we commenced to debate it yesterday. To-day one of the members of the committee came to me and said: "I am surprised; I had no idea this bill contained the provisions which it contains, and I propose that it shall go back to the committee so that we may perfect it."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not wonder he was surprised if he took the statement the Senator from North Dakota has made about it. I should think it would surprise anybody on earth.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. No; he had been listening to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from New Hampshire has not been occupying the floor to-day until now.

Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from North Dakota has become so watchful, at this late hour, in reference to matters before the Committee on the District of Columbia. When the Senator says that bills are not properly considered in that committee he does a great injustice to the committee.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I did not say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, what did the Senator say? I pause for a reply.

Mr. President, the Senator has produced a paper here that seems to be the statement of the action of a committee of the Board of Trade called the railroad committee. Those gentlemen did not appear before the committee. This bill has been there for two months. They did not raise a voice against it. If I mistake not, the Board of Trade, at a meeting of that organization, indorsed this bill. I may be wrong, but I think I am right. But a few days ago a committee (I see it is signed by two men, one of whom lives in Virginia and another somewhere else) found out that this is a bad bill, and they have taken their pencils and have gone to work and figured out that under this bill the District of Columbia is to pay $2,804,000.

Mr. President, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have examined this bill very carefully. They are very competent men. They have the interests of this District very closely at heart, and I have never known anything that was hostile to the interests of the District of Columbia to escape the careful scrutiny of this Commission, composed of very able and learned men. They have made a calculation and they say it will cost the District $1,635,000. I submit that the District Commissioners are better able to determine what the provisions of this bill are, when they have had it under consideration days and weeks, than a committee of a business organization which very likely gave it consideration for a few hours.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has presented a substitute for this bill. It proposes municipal ownership of a union railroad station in the city of Washington, and it proposes, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] says, a monumental union railroad station. I wish the Senator, if he had for any reason deemed it wise or expedient to exploit the matter of municipal ownership, had reserved his efforts for some bill that was really a municipal bill, some measure that dealt with municipal matters wholly, rather than for a measure of this kind, which is so important not only to the interests of the District, but to the Government and to the people of the entire country.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me just a word?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. My bill does not provide for municipal ownership. It provides for a commission, consisting of the Chief Engineer of the Army, the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, and the United States Railroad Commissioner, and two citizens to be appointed by the President. That would be more likely to be a United States commission. So we would have the cooperation of the War Department to construct a union station at the capital of the United States.

I referred to the municipal ownership of the subway in Boston simply by way of illustration to show that it had been a paying affair in the city of Boston, and that there was no reason why it should not be a paying affair in the District of Columbia, and that I preferred that system rather than make a donation, to give a bonus or subsidy of six or seven millions to this corporation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the city of Boston is making an experiment with a little subway through which a line of electric cars is run. It may be a good investment. Shortly after that subway was built there was a terrible explosion in it, and there are to-day damage cases, aggregating millions of dollars, that are yet to be settled. I do not know whether they will be able to pay dividends on the cost of that subway or not, but at best it is a tunnel through a small portion of the city of Boston.

As I suggested the other day, the great State of Massachusetts bored a tunnel through Hoosac Mountain, and the State of Massachusetts undertook to operate it, and utterly failed to operate it to the interests of the people of Massachusetts. They hastened to lease it to a private corporation, and afterwards sold it. That was a little experiment in the progressive and rich State of Massachusetts of municipal ownership that did not pan out very well, as we Yankees sometimes say.

It may be that this little subway in Boston will be a profitable enterprise. It has not been there long enough for us to know whether it will be profitable or not; but whether it is or not, it is a very different proposition from the proposition that is involved in building a union railroad station for the city of Washington and for the six or seven railroad corporations that center at the capital of the nation.

Mr. President, the Senator has presented his substitute. It is a very crudely drawn measure. He is going to have a station, but he does not say where he is going to have it. I do not know but that he is going to have it attached to one of Santos-Dumont's dirigible baloons up in the air over the city of Washington, to be reached by some method or other. It may be that the Senator is going to have it in Eckington, or in Washington, or on the classic shores of the Eastern Branch. He has not provided any place for it, but he is going to have a great union station, built by the District of Columbia, and I suppose they can build precisely where they please.

The Senator proposes that the District shall invest $10,000,000 in that station, and yet the District Commissioners say it is going to cost $14,814,103 to build the station as it is contemplated. I do not know whether this is to be as great a station as that or not, but it is very evident, Mr. President, that the Senator has not provided a suitable location for his station, and he has not made a sufficient appropriation to construct it along the lines that the District Committee and the District Commissioners have thought were desirable for the city of Washington.

The existing railroad companies, according to the Senator's bill, are to remove their buildings and tracks, but no provision is made to compensate them. I suppose he is going to proceed upon the assumption that some men have defended in this country that we can confiscate private property if we choose to do it. I think if the Senator's scheme should go through here he or somebody would have some litigation in the District of Columbia that might be very expensive.

Now, Mr. President, I do not believe we are going into municipal ownership in the District of Columbia of a railroad station. I think I understand the Senator's purpose, and I do not believe the Senator himself expects we will ever do it. I believe furthermore, Mr. President, that we are not going to dispossess the railroad companies of this District of the privileges that were granted to them more than a quarter of a century ago. I do not believe we are going to repeal the laws that were passed a year and a half ago, unless we provide, as we do in this bill, for something better for the District of Columbia.

If this bill fails, then the two railroad corporations will proceed to build under the laws that were passed in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and we will have a station near the site of the Baltimore and Ohio and we will have a station substantially on the site now occupied by the Baltimore and Potomac road. That is what is coming, and it is a mere question whether or not we want that condition of things in the city of Washington or whether we want, as is contemplated by this bill, one magnificent union station that will be a monument and a pride to every citizen of this great Republic.

Mr. President, Senators of course have a right to take issue with the conclusion reached by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have not given very much time to the consideration of this matter. I have cooperated with the distinguished chairman of the committee as best I could, and I want to say that in all the history of legislation no Senator has ever given more careful study, more patient consideration, more enlightened judgment to a public measure than has the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] to the bill that is now before the Senate of the United States. He is a thorough business man. He is a man whose integrity has never been questioned. He is a man who has the interest of this beautiful city at heart. He is a man who, for his life, would not recommend anything that would not in his judgment be calculated to best subserve the interests of the people of Washington and the people of the whole country. He believes in this bill as I believe in it, and it rests now with the Senate in its wisdom to say whether or not, as the Senator from North Dakota suggests it may, but which I know it will not do, send it back to the committee for further consideration, or whether or not it shall be enacted into law or defeated by a vote of the Senate, and these two railroad corporations be permitted to construct new stations under the acts of Congress that were adopted during the session of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Now, Mr. President, consider for just one moment the question of an ornamental railroad station in the city of Washington. The railroad companies do not want it. Why should they want it? Mr. Loree, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, a man of wonderful ability and of great railroad experience, said to our committee: "We do not want any such railroad structure as that. We want a railroad building like the station in the city of London, placarded from top to bottom with handbills. We want a business station. That is what we want, and if I had my way," he said, "that is the kind of a station I would build, because it is a question of business with us and not a question of ornamentation. But if the Congress of the United States requires us to build a railroad station of this kind, we will put our hands in our pockets and expend millions of dollars for the simple purpose of ornamentation and for nothing else." My good, dear, lovable friend from Arkansas smiles at this observation, and yet the Senator must know that there are millions of dollars to go into this proposed structure that will not benefit the railroad corporation one single dollar.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me one moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. I smile because the Senator, in referring to the president of the Baltimore and Ohio road, said it was purely a matter of business with him; that he wanted a station that could be placarded all over, and this was what he desired, and in the next breath said that that railroad president would put his hand in his pocket and spend millions of dollars in order to ornament the city.

Mr. GALLINGER. If Congress demanded it.

Mr. BERRY. I was smiling at the inconsistent statement the Senator made in the same breath. Mr. President, I think that the first statement of the president of the railroad was the correct statement; that it was purely a matter of business with him; and when the Senator tells me that the presidents of these two railroads through patriotism are going to build a station that will ornament this city I tell him that I think he is mistaken.

Mr. GALLINGER. So far——

Mr. BERRY. They are going to build it and have it because Congress is going to furnish a large part of the money to help them build it, if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Congress is not going to get a profit on a piece of iron or a piece of granite in that station.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I wish to make an observation before I yield. The Senator from Arkansas thought that I was inconsistent, but the gray matter of the Senator, which usually runs in a level direction, became a little bit involved just at that point; that was all.

I say, Mr. President, Congress demands that this kind of a structure shall be built. Congress has made an appropriation for the purpose of helping eliminate the grade crossings in the District of Columbia, and these corporations—not this corporation, the two corporations—propose to expend $13,073,103, according to the figures furnished by the District Commissioners, and yet the Senator says that they of their own free will and because it is a good business proposition are willing to expend $13,000,000 in the District of Columbia to construct a railroad station.

I say to you, Mr. President, that they would not do anything of the kind if they were left to themselves. They would not construct any such railroad station. They would not spend any such amount of money, but it is demanded of them by Congress. It is demanded of them by the gentlemen who have this great park system in their keeping and who are hoping to see the city of Washington, as I hope to live and see it, infinitely more beautiful than it is to-day. These gentlemen have some patriotism as well as the rest of us, and they are willing to pay something to help along this great scheme of beautification of this city, and they deserve, Mr. President, unstinted praise from the Senate of the United States instead of the denunciation that has been heaped upon them in this debate.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have said all I will say on this bill——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in the hands of the Senate, and the Senate can either follow the lead of my distinguished and delightful friend from North Dakota into the misty realms of municipal ownership, the Senate can reject this bill and relegate these railroad companies to the statute that they have now, under which they can build two railroad stations unless Congress repeals those acts (and Congress will not repeal those acts if this proposed law fails), or Congress can in its wisdom pass this bill and start this grand scheme of beautifying the city of Washington, and do something that future generations will applaud us for instead of condemning us. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his kindness. I simply want to ask the Senator how it is these railroad companies—he speaks of them in the plural—propose to spend $13,000,000 in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. They have furnishsd their figures to the District Commissioners and the District Commissioners have tabulated them and say they are going to spend it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The District Commissioners have accepted their figures, and we have got to accept the figures of the District Commissioners.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will ask the Senator another question? How much will this monumental station cost?

Mr. GALLINGER. About $5,000,000.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The report of the Commissioners says, I think the Senator will find, $4,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I think it says probably $5,000,000,

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I may have misread it, but I think the Senator will find it $4,000,000; that they said it will cost $4,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Now, we are giving, according to the Senator's own admission, over $4,000,000 in money and property.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think we are giving any such amount.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In property and money.

Mr. GALLINGER. In building a station?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yes. In addition to that the railroads, according to their figures, are going to spend $13,000,000. I ask the Senator as a railroad expert to explain how they are going to spend $13,000,000 outside of the monumental station itself?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I think I made a misstatement. I got the wrong figures. The District Commissioners say that the railroad companies will expend $10,073,103, not $13,000,000, and that the United States and the District of Columbia will spend $4,770,000.

Now, Mr. President, I have stated this question as accurately and as consistently as I possibly could. I do not think the multiplication of words would add to its elucidation. Some Senators say I have not elucidated it at all. If I have failed to do so, of course it would be idle for me to continue the discussion.

Mr. BERRY. The Senator from New Hampshire has asserted again and again that this railroad company acquired rights in 1871 with which Congress will not interfere. I want to read from a part of an article printed in the Star, of this city, in which it is stated—

> The original grant of the right to occupy the Mall for railroad purposes was distinctly temporary. The right to repeal was reserved to the United States avowedly to permit the nation to reclaim it when needed for park purposes. The House refused to value the land and to exact the amount from the railroad lest the national power to reclaim should be destroyed.
> Mr. Cameron, a conspicuous champion of the measure, said in the Senate: "I desire to say also that the bill contains a proviso allowing Congress to remove the depot at any future time when they desire the ground for a park or for any other purpose. The bill gives Congress the power to do it, and leaves it entirely in the control of Congress."

Then I repeat, Mr. President, that that was the understanding when they moved there. They have occupied it for thirty-one years without paying any rent whatever to the Government of the United States, used that land for that length of time, and yet the Senator from New Hampshire says that Congress is under obligation to pay the Pennsylvania Railroad $1,500,000 before they can be required to remove from there.

I repeat that when the law was passed it was asserted by Mr. Cameron that the Government would have the right to remove them at any time. They went in with that understanding and they have used it for thirty-one years without paying rent. The Government does not owe them one dollar. The Government is under no obligation to pay them any sum of money whatever, and yet the Senator says that we ought to appropriate, I believe he admits, $4,600,000 for the District and the Government together, and it is claimed that it will be six or seven million dollars.

Now, the Senator made another assertion about the abuses that have been heaped upon these railroad presidents. I am sure that he did not intend to apply that to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. BERRY. I have not abused them. The Senator himself said that the president of one of these roads said it was purely a matter of business with him, that he wanted such a depot out of which he could make the most money; but immediately asserted thereafter that he was willing to expend a million of dollars of his own money. Yet because I thought there was an inconsistency in that statement the Senator seems to think that my brain was not altogether as clear as it might be.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will accept my correction of his statement I have no objection, but——

Mr. BERRY. I will accept it.

Mr. GALLINGER. He does not state it as I said it.

Mr. BERRY. I certainly understood the Senator to say that the president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad said they did not want any ornamental depot; that they wanted such a one as they have in London, placarded all over with advertisements; that it was with him a matter of business. If he did not say that I certainly misunderstood him, and I think every other Senator here understood him to say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is practically correct that far.

Mr. BERRY. Then he stated afterwards that these gentlemen, if required by Congress, were willing to pay a great deal of money out of their own pockets. Now, Congress has made no such requirement of them. The Senator has argued here all day that they can make no such requirement of them, and yet he says if required by Congress.

Mr. President, you can argue this from now until Thursday morning, it comes back to the same proposition after all, that these railroad companies are compelled to have, in order to properly do their business, additional facilities for depot purposes, and instead of taking the money out of their own pockets (and I am not abusing them about it; I have made no abuse of them about it) they are willing that Congress shall step in and take the money out of the Treasury and build this fine depot for them, and if it will do that they will take it. That is the situation.

The Senator says these grade crossings have been paid for by other cities. Well, Mr. President, as I said a while ago, municipal corporations have done a good many things that I would hate for Congress to follow.

He spoke of Philadelphia. It was asserted a year or so ago in the newspapers, and, I think, never denied there, that individuals offered $5,000,000 in money for a certain franchise in the city of Philadelphia, and yet the municipal corporations granted it to other parties for nothing. I say that is a kind of precedent that I do not think the Senate ought to follow.

I conclude this matter, and all I expect to say about it, as I began. I had no thought of getting into this discussion until on yesterday evening. When I heard the Senator from New Hampshire state what was proposed to be done by this bill, it struck me that it was a gross injustice, that it was an act that could never be defended when the people's representatives took this amount of money—admitted by him to be $4,600,000—from the Government and from the District and paid it over to a corporation already immensely wealthy. It is unfair. It is useless to talk about the Library, which is a Government building, owned by the whole people of the United States, which was built to beautify and ornament the city, and then turn and say because that has been done that we shall give individuals money in order to get them to build structures which will beautify and ornament the city. I say it is not justified.

While I do not agree with the Senator from North Dakota in regard to his proposed remedy, and I do expect to vote for it, at the same time I will not vote for this bill, but I should be glad to vote to repeal the act of a year and a half ago, which all say should never have been passed, which can be repealed today under an express provision. There is no excuse for not doing it if it is a bad law and ought to be repealed. I will vote to repeal that, and then we will see as to where and how it will best suit the Government of the United States and the people in this District to have these depots located.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in reply to the observation the Senator has made two or three times that we all admit the legislation of the Fifty-sixth Congress was bad legislation, I simply wish to say that I do not admit anything of the kind. We deemed it wise then, and if this bill fails I think it will be determined that that was wise legislation.

DISAPPEARING GUN CARRIAGES.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask that a synopsis of the reports of artillery officers on the subject of disappearing gun carriages, printed in Senate Document No. 336, may be printed as a document. The letters themselves are very long, but this is a synopsis of them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont? The Chair hears none.

The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 26th ultimo, certain information from the Chief of Ordnance relative to the number of disappearing gun carriages constructed and under contract or construction or authorized, and for what caliber of guns, by whom constructed, etc.

The Chair understands that this communication is in response to a resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont by whom this synopsis has been prepared?

Mr. PROCTOR. It was made in the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. It was prepared by some one of that board or some of the officials for the Secretary of War?

Mr. HARRIS. It came through the Secretary of War.

Mr. PROCTOR. The synopsis does not come through the Secretary of War, as I understand, but it was made to him, and he has it.

Mr. HARRIS. Has he had the synopsis prepared?

Mr. PROCTOR. He had the synopsis prepared and has it in his office. I have not called upon him for that synopsis or the original documents in his possession.

Mr. HARRIS. It is an official document, then, from the Secretary of War?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes; certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have it printed?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document will be ordered to be printed, and it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, if there be no objection.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask if an order has been made for the printing of that document?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order has been made, but it can be easily reconsidered. The Chair will regard it as an open question. The Chair inquired of the Senator from Vermont, as it is in response to a resolution offered by him, whether or not he desired to have the communication printed.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the document the Senator wishes printed is another document, and is not in response to his resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the other document has nothing to do with the resolution of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. WARREN. The papers in the hands of the Senator from Vermont are the papers furnished by the War Department in response to his resolution, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They are.

Mr. WARREN. Have those papers been ordered to be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was just asking the Senator from Vermont whether he desired to have them printed.

Mr. PROCTOR. I say of course they should be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed, in the absence of objection.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 13, 1902.

Resolved, That the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. MAHON, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. SIMS be the managers of the conference on the part of the House with the following instructions: That the conferees be instructed not to agree to what is known as the Selfridge board findings in the Senate amendments.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care anything about the instructions, but does that leave this a free conference?

Mr. CULLOM. Not very free, I should think.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I was going to ask as a parliamentary inquiry whether if I moved that the request for a conference be granted and conferees appointed we are in any way bound by the action of the House? As I understand it, the blanks on which we make our returns and the language usually employed in making a conference report sets forth that we have had a free and full conference, etc. If the request of the House is for a full and free conference on the entire bill or the amendments at issue, then I wish to have the request of the House granted.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator must be able to say that the request of the House is for a full and free conference except as to one item, whatever it may be, and as to that there is to be no conference at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course the Senate is not bound at all by the instructions given by the House of Representatives to its conferees. It may, to a certain extent, deprive it of its character of a full and free conference, but the Senate can insist upon its amendments and go into conference again if it desires to do so. If it does not go into conference, of course the bill is ended.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I wish to make an inquiry as a matter of parliamentary procedure. The House in refusing to agree to a conference report has instructed its conferees. Has it been the practice to send those instructions with its message to the Senate? I do not think I have ever known of it before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair never has seen anything of that kind done before.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That has been my impression, and this is entirely new in parliamentary procedure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wyoming explain to the Senate what are the items in controversy, and why there was no agreement reached?

Mr. WARREN. I have no information further than what comes from the reading of the report at the desk. The Senator might ask to have it read again.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read again.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that it be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will probably be sufficient to report the action of the House as to instructions.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I recollect once we had a dispute on a naval appropriation bill and the House conferees refused absolutely to even report a disagreement. Then the matter was voted on in the Senate as to the items in disagreement, and the Senate receded and that ended the trouble. There is an item in this bill in which I am very much interested. It is the claim in regard to the war of 1812, which I have been trying to get settled here for three or four years, and there are several other State claims that are very important matters to some of us; but it seems that the trouble is about the claims which were reported by the Selfridge board. I was going to ask whether it would be in order, after the conference report is read, to move that the Senate recede from its amendments to which the House seems so much opposed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to make a motion. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments, and grant the request of the House for a conference.

Mr. TELLER. Let us have it read, Mr. President, so that we may know what the House has sent us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. MAHON, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. SIMS be the managers of the conference on the part of the House with the following instructions: That the conferees be instructed not to agree to what is known as the Selfridge board findings in the Senate amendments.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, as that practically forecloses one subject which should be given a free conference, I ask that the report may go over for a day in order that it may be examined.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it will go over for a day.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE IN CUBA.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13996) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service in the Republic of Cuba, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

S. M. CULLOM,
JOHN T. MORGAN,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT R. HITT,
HUGH A. DINSMORE,
ROBERT ADAMS, JR.,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to have the Senator explain what the amendments are.

Mr. CULLOM. I am going to do that. The Senate amended the House bill by increasing the salary of the minister proposed to be sent to Cuba from $10,000 to $12,000. It also amended the bill by making an appropriation of $2,000 for rent of a building for the legation, and also provided for an additional consul. The conferees of the two Houses met and agreed upon the first amendment, namely, that increasing the salary of the minister, but the Senate conferees were compelled to yield as to the other two amendments, it being stated, as is known to everyone, that the Government of the United States has not been in the habit of renting houses for our ministers abroad. It was also stated that the additional consul provided for in the bill was not needed, because there was no business there of any account for him to do.

Mr. HOAR. What is the title, may I ask the Senator, that is given to Cuba? What is the title of the bill? Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republic of Cuba.

Mr. HOAR. Is the American flag to be hauled down there, I ask the Senator?

Mr. CULLOM. The American flag will probably be hauled down when a government is set up.

Mr. HOAR. I thought we never hauled it down when it was once put up.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask for the adoption of the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the report?

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 14, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

TUESDAY, May 13, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if this is a conference report on what is known as the omnibus claims bill?

Mr. MAHON. The omnibus bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to raise a point of order against the conference report at the proper time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read instead of the report. The statement explains everything.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the reading of the report be omitted, and that the statement only be read. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the statement and report be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects. The Clerk will read both the report and the statement.

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

On page 8 of said Senate amendment, between lines numbered 15 and 16, insert the following:

"To Charles M. Flower, Frank S. Flower, William Flower, and D. Sprigg Flower, children of Charles H. Flower, deceased, of Rapides Parish, $23,357."

On page 10 of said Senate amendment, between lines numbered 18 and 19, insert the following:

"To Henry R. Walton, administrator of John Walton, deceased, of Anne Arundel County, $5,083.

"To William S. Tildon, of Harford County, $330."

On page 14 of said Senate amendment, between lines numbered 23 and 24, insert the following:

"To John W. Hancock, of Iron County, $1,160."

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL, 1902.

Amount of bill as passed by the House	$213,105.51
Net increase by the Senate	2,929,252.09
Amount of bill passed by the Senate	3,142,357.60

Of the increase made by the Senate of $2,929,252.09, the House has agreed to $2,451,746.60, and the Senate has receded from $477,505.49, making the total of the bill, direct appropriation, as agreed to in conference, $2,664,852.11.

The Clerk proceeded to read the statement, as follows:

Statement to accompany conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if it is not proper to make the point of order against the report before the statement is read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can reserve his point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is the point of order against the report or against the statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The point of order is against the report.

The SPEAKER. It will have to be made at this time. If the point is well taken, the statement will not be read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the point of order I have to make against this report of the conferees is that the conferees have proposed amendments that had not been committed to them by either House, and not germane to the subject of difference between the two Houses.

Now, the facts in reference to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, are these: This bill originally passed the House carrying a number of claims known as the Bowman Act claims. It went to the Senate, and the Senate struck out the entire House bill after the enacting clause and added two amendments. The second amendment is immaterial, because it only relates to the title of the bill. So that, as the bill stands before the House, it practically stands as one Senate amendment. In that amendment proposed by the Senate it reinserted the Bowman Act claims as passed by the House, and then, in addition to those claims, a number of other claims, a number of claims providing for the payment of the Selfridge Board findings, a number of claims in reference to the payment of State debts, and a number of private claims.

The House, after considering the bill with the Senate amendments in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, added one amendment to the Senate amendment, and then when the bill came back from the Committee of the Whole into the House the House nonconcurred in all the Senate amendments and sent the bill to conference. After the bill reached the conference there were a number of changes made in the bill, many of them germane to the subject-matter of the differences between the two Houses, but in a comparison of the two bills—that is, the original House bill as it passed the House and the bill known as the Senate amendment as it passed the Senate—I find that the conferees have inserted certain items of appropriation that are neither in the bill as it passed the House nor in the Senate amendment.

In other words, it was not in either document that was sent by either House or Senate to the conferees. But before stating these claims I will say that the conferees have stated in their report what these changes are, but have not stated that they were in neither bill. Therefore I call the attention of the Chair to the fact. One item neither in the House nor Senate bill, as stated in the conference report on page 8 of the Senate amendment, between lines 15 and 16, is the following:

To Charles M. Flower, Frank S. Flower, William Flower, and D. Sprigg Flower, children of Charles H. Flower, deceased, of Rapides Parish, $23,357.

Again they insert the claim:

To Henry R. Walton, administrator of John Walton, deceased, of Anne Arundel County, $5,083.

Then they insert:

To John W. Hancock, of Iron County, $1,100.

I will state that that claim was inserted by the Committee of the Whole in the House. The other claims were not. Then I also find the claim:

To William B. Horner, late of Shelby County, $1,250.

That was not considered by either body; and

To Mary E. O. Dashiell, late of Norfolk County, $810.

So I do not think there is any dispute between us, and I would like the gentleman to correct me if the statement I have made is not correct. I have carefully compared the two bills, and find nowhere in the original bill any of these items. Is not that correct?

Mr. MAHON. The Flower claim and the Walton claim are in the original bill as it passed the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to speak louder so that the Chair can hear what he says.

Mr. MAHON. The Flower claim and the Walton claim were in the bill as it passed the House, and were stricken out by the Senate. I will explain that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no question between us in reference to the fact that there are claims inserted in this bill neither in the House bill as it passed the House nor in the Senate amendment as it passed the Senate, and have been put into the bill by the conferees.

Now, the point that I make is that the only questions that were legitimately before the conferees on this bill were matters that were in dispute between the House and the Senate; that the conferees had no control of and no right to insert matter that was in neither report. Now, I propose, Mr. Speaker, to call the Chair's attention to a ruling of Speaker Carlisle that was made in the Forty-eighth Congress.

The House passed a bill to make appropriations for river and harbor improvements. That bill went to the Senate, and after reaching the Senate all the text of that bill was stricken out except the enacting clause. The Senate then inserted various items of appropriation for river and harbor improvements. The bill came back to the House, was nonconcurred in, and a conference was ordered. The conferees in that instance changed some of the text of the bill. I have been unable to find the original bill and amendments. I therefore can not tell from this decision of Speaker Carlisle whether or not the changes made by the conferees was as to new matter or whether it was not as to new matter and what was germane to the text of the bill. I call the Speaker's attention to this question first before giving the decisions that I rely on to sustain the point of order, because it may seem that the decision of Speaker Carlisle might be against the proposition that I assert. Mr. Carlisle in announcing his decision said:

The House passed a bill to provide for the improvement of rivers and harbors and making an appropriation for that purpose. That bill was sent to the Senate, where it was amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a different proposition in some respects, but a proposition having the same object in view. When that came back to the House it was treated, and properly so, as one single amendment and not as a series of amendments, as was contended for by some gentlemen on the floor at the time.

It was nonconcurred in by the House and a conference was appointed upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. That conference committee having met, reports back the Senate amendment as a single amendment with various amendments, and recommends that it be concurred in with the other amendments which the committee has incorporated in its report. The question, therefore, is not whether the provisions to which the gentleman from Illinois alludes are germane to the original bill as it passed the House but whether they are germane to the Senate amendment which the House had under consideration and which was referred to the committee of conference. If germane to that amendment, the point of order can not be sustained on the ground claimed by the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair thinks they are germane to the Senate amendment, for though different from the provisions contained in the Senate amendment they relate to the same subject; and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Now, Mr. Carlisle there determines that these amendments related to the same subject. I do not take it that he meant in rendering that decision that they related to the general scope of the bill, a bill for river and harbor improvement, but that they related to the particular items or subjects in which the amendment was made. For instance, an appropriation for the Tennessee River might be amended and be germane, but a new appropriation for the Tennessee River, not in the Senate amendment, would not have been germane and would not have properly been before the conferees. If Mr. Carlisle decided the question on the other point, that the conferees in a general bill of this class, a bill relating to rivers and harbors, was open to any amendment that the conferees saw fit to insert in the bill, then I say it would be a very dangerous decision, Mr. Speaker, and one that the Chair and the House should not follow. That is the only decision that I can find anywhere that would relate to amendments of this kind being inserted in the bill.

But we have a more recent ruling, a stronger ruling on this proposition, and one that, it seems to me, clearly in point, made by Mr. Blaine when Speaker of this House. I will read to the Chair. It is section 1415 of Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents:

On April 19, 1871, Mr. Henry L. Dawes, of Massachusetts, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House No. 19 (deficiency appropriations), submitted a report thereon in writing.

Mr. William S. Holman, of Indiana, made the point of order that the report contained matter not a subject of difference between the two Houses. Mr. Holman specified that there were incorporated in the report two propositions which were new—a provision making appropriations for the Sutro Tunnel and another for the Agricultural Department. These matters, he submitted, were not referred to the committee of conference at all. He understood that the committee of conference was not authorized to consider matters which had been neither incorporated in Senate amendments nor brought before the House.

The Speaker said:

The rule is as broad as the gentleman from Indiana states it, with this reservation—new propositions may be introduced, but there must be something in the bill to make them germane as amendments. The power of a conference committee which, as gentlemen well know, the two Houses have been in the habit of considerably enlarging fairly includes the power to incorporate germane amendments. If the gentleman from Indiana makes the point that the amendments he specifies are not germane, the Chair will examine the question, but the mere fact that the propositions embrace matters which were not originally before the House or Senate would not be sufficient to require them to be ruled out.

After further debate, during which it was shown that the Sutro-tunnel appropriation was not in the bill when it went to conference, but, as Mr. DAWES stated, was put in to reconcile the Senate conferees to the striking out of an appropriation for the Carson mint, the Speaker said:

The point of order lies against the conference report, but during the experience of the Chair on this floor he has never known a conference report ruled out on a point of order. The report of a conference committee is always received as embodying the conclusions of both Houses, or the representatives of both branches of Congress. The Chair will therefore submit the point of order to the House.

The point of order, being put to the House, was sustained by a vote of 82 ayes to 33 noes.

Now, there is another decision by Speaker Reed which I desire to read, which will be found in paragraph 1417 of Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents:

On June 20, 1898, Mr. JOSEPH W. BABCOCK, of Wisconsin, submitted a conference report on the bill (H. R. 6148) to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company and the Maryland and Washington Railway, etc.

Mr. WILLIAM P. HEPBURN, of Iowa, made the point of order that the committee of conference had inserted matter over which it had no jurisdiction. A Senate amendment had proposed to extend to other roads a privilege enjoyed by one. The conferees had added an amendment striking out this extension of privilege to others and also taking away the privilege enjoyed by the one.

During the debate it was urged on the one side that the conferees had jurisdiction only on the subject of the disagreeing votes, and that the repeal of this privilege was not in disagreement. On the other hand, it was argued that the Senate had introduced the subject-matter by their amendment, and that it was proper for the conferees to amend it.

The Speaker (Mr. Reed), sustaining the point of order, said:

"If we were to adopt the idea that when once the subject-matter was introduced, that was to control, and not the difference between the two bodies, we should be likely to enlarge the powers of the committee of conference over and beyond what was intended by the House. To the Chair it seems the point of order is well taken, and therefore the Chair sustains it."

Now, Mr. Speaker, whatever may be said of Mr. Carlisle's former ruling in reference to a river and harbor bill—and I do not think that ruling would sustain the insertion of these items in the bill—clearly Mr. Reed's decision, that the only point that should be held in order is the question of differences between the two Houses, is sustained by the logic and reason of the situation. We can find parliamentary decisions on almost every point and looking in every direction; but in order to come to a clear and fair conception of the rule and to render a decision that will fairly guard the interests of the House in this matter, we must consider it from the standpoint of what is intended by the House.

We adopt rules in the House, Mr. Speaker, not to limit the membership of the House in the transaction of public business, but in order to guide and guard the legislation that comes before Congress. We require that all bills and all other matters brought before Congress shall first be carried to a committee and considered there, in order that they may be carefully digested before being brought up in the House. That is the object of having a rule that a point of order can be made against an amendment that is not germane to a matter already considered by the committee. For the same reason the House adopted this rule in reference to conferees. The purpose and object of appointing a conference committee is not that it may report legislation.

There is but one object intended by the House and by the rules in appointing a conference committee, and that is to effect a compromise by which the two Houses may unite in a conclusion which might not be otherwise attained. And when you broaden that rule, when you go outside of that rule, when you extend the powers of the conferees beyond that one proposition, Mr. Speaker, you carry the House into an unknown sea of legislation where we can not be protected in the days at the close of the session when legislation is "rushed," and when we must rely absolutely on the reports of conference committees. The only thing that can safeguard the House is to hold strictly to the rule as Mr. Reid laid it down in the Fifty-fifth Congress—that the conferees must be held to the differences that existed between the two Houses, and not be allowed to enter upon new legislation.

Now, there is no dispute in this case. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself are agreed on the facts. The conferees have taken this bill into conference and inserted matter that was unknown either in the Claims Committee of the House or the Claims Committee of the Senate—matter reported by neither body and which was never considered by the Senate and House of Representatives.

That being the case, I think the Chair should sustain the point of order, should reject this conference report, and hold the conferees strictly to the points of difference between the two Houses.

It may be argued that this is an omnibus claims bill, and that therefore the conferees can insert new matter. But if the House goes to the point of holding that when you bring in an omnibus bill for the erection of public buildings or for river and harbor improvements or for claims, anything which is germane to the general subject-matter—in a claims bill anything relating to the payment of claims against the Government, or in a river and harbor bill anything relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors, or in an omnibus public-building bill anything that is germane to that general subject—then the House and the committees of the House absolutely lose control of the subject-matter. You make the conferees the legislating committee with all the power of the conference report behind them, giving them special privileges and precedence over everything in the House to put through legislation, and with the temptation to members who have claims already in the bill——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama suspend a moment? The Chair is not clear as to what items the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Pennsylvania are agreed upon as being new items. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania as referring to the same items which are referred to by the gentleman from Alabama. Are the items numbered in the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The items are not numbered in the bill; they are specified in the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman give the number of the items in the conference report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They are not numbered; I shall have to read them by name.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the conference report been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is in the RECORD of the Senate proceedings of May 5.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Page 5381.

The first item to which I refer the Chair is—

To John W. Hancock, of Iron County, $1,160.

This was inserted in the Committee of the Whole when the bill was in the House, but was not put in by the House. The House rejected the entire Senate amendment and nonconcurred in the whole matter, and therefore, although that claim was considered in Committee of the Whole, it was never in difference or dispute between the two Houses.

I refer also to this item:

To William B. Horner, late of Shelby County, $1,250.

There is no dispute whatever between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself as to whether this was in or out. He admits it was never in either bill. Also to Mary E. O. Dashiell, late of Norfolk County, $810. Some of the other items that I thought were not in the bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] claims were in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair understands there are two items, that of John W. Hancock, of Iron County, $1,160, and that of William B. Horner, late of Shelby County, $1,250.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought the other items were not in either bill, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] corrects me on that. We both agree on these two items and that the point of order would affect one just as much as the other, so there is no use of discussing the question as to whether the other items are in or out. Now, as I said, the only good reason in the world that we could give to hold that these items are germane—it is not a dispute that they were a difference between the two Houses—would be to hold they are germane to the whole subject-matter of the bill. There is no other item in the bill to which they relate. They did not relate in any way, then, to any other particular item in this bill. The only way that they could be held germane and therefore a subject of conference would be to hold they are germane, because the title of this bill is a general claims bill, and you would therefore be entitled to put in any claims on earth against the Government of the United States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose the House and Senate adopted this report, after full consideration of both Houses, what fundamental objection is there to that operation? Is not that and would that not be legal legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not think it is proper legislation for the House and the Senate to put matters in in conference that have not been considered by both Houses.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose the House and Senate each considered the new items after the conferees had put them in the bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, but that is not the proposition before us.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is just what we are doing now, as I understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Neither the House nor the Senate has considered the proposition.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We will do that in the House now if given a chance. We can now see whether they are good or bad claims. Certainly the regular practice is better, indeed the safer way.

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in regard to the Hancock claim, that it appeared from the showing here before the Committee of the Whole House that that was a claim that was before the Committee on War Claims and was overlooked and was inserted here by a unanimous vote of the House when that bill was pending before the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman I have stated that fact to the Chair.

Mr. ROBB. That certainly amounts to an instruction to the committee on conference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not making a point against this particular claim. I do not know but the claim may be a very just one. It is the report that I am making the point of order against. If those claims were legitimately before the House, I would probably vote for both of them. I would not say they are good or bad, but the point that I am making is that they are not properly a subject of conference, and the conferees have exceeded their powers in making this report—that therefore no report has been made to this House.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, there is no trouble about this matter. The conferees acted entirely within their scope. In relation to this point of order, the conferees of the House and of the Senate examined the parliamentary law on this subject very carefully, and there is no disposition to put anything into this bill simply because it is a claims bill. The bill was sent from the House to the Senate, and the Senate struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted one amendment, which amendment was in paragraphs. The first 20 pages of that amendment relate entirely to the Bowman Act cases—cases that have been sent from this House to the Court of Claims and have been returned to the Speaker and the President of the Senate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, they are claims here on the Calendar of this House. One was for William B. Horner, of $1,250. He is an old soldier, a man who is now up in the eighties, as I am told. He has fought his claim through the Court of Claims, and has been at it for ten years, and finally got a verdict of $1,100. The other one returned was the Hancock claim. That is a Bowman Act claim of the same class as was in the Senate amendment for some $1,100. Now, I am told that he is a very old man. The other is for an old lady. Now, these are the only three matters. There is nothing in this conference report except what was in the House bill as it went to the Senate and in the Senate amendment as it came back to the House.

The SPEAKER. To which bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MAHON. To the Hancock and Horner claims.

The SPEAKER. Which was the one that was in the House bill?

Mr. MAHON. Charles Flower in the House bill, and Henry Walton.

The SPEAKER. Was the Hancock bill in the House bill?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Was the Horner bill in the House bill?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Was the Dashiell bill in the House bill?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Were they put in in the Senate?

Mr. MAHON. No.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we consulted about this, and out of sympathy for these old people, their claims having come in, and there being only three of them, if they had been younger people probably the conferees would not have put them in. They were added to that part of the amendment that related to the Bowman Act claims from the Court of Claims, and were on that subject alone. Now let me read you a decision of this House:

Although the Senate had amended a bill of the House by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting a different proposition in some respects, yet having the same object in view, the question presented was not whether the provisions excepted to in the conference report were germane to the original House bill, but whether they were germane to the Senate amendments. In the opinion of the Chair, they were clearly germane; for though different from the provisions contained in such amendment, they related directly to the same subjects—and under the common parliamentary law and practice might be made, by way of amendment, a substantially different proposition from that originally passed by the House.

You will find that in the RECORD of the Forty-ninth Congress, page 7932. So I might quote decision after decision. Now, the conferees had under consideration that part of the amendment in relation to the Bowman Act claims. We struck some out that we thought perhaps ought not to be in, and we inserted these three, exactly on the same subject, in the same part of the amendment, relating to the Bowman Act cases. There is no question but what they are germane to that amendment.

Now, the gentleman talks about appropriating for Tennessee in the river and harbor bill. Of course you could not amend that amendment by putting one in for another State. They are different subjects; but here is the paragraph in this bill relating to the Bowman Act cases, and the conferees after long consideration put them in, not to take any advantage of the House. They were perfectly fair about it, and they put them in simply because they were germane to that amendment, being the same subject-matter, although not in the original bill as it left the House, or in the Senate amendment. I do not think there is any use taking up time. I thought it was understood, or they would not have gone in. We were satisfied they were germane to the paragraph of the bill. All of the decisions are on that line, that where they are not in the House bill and where they are not in the Senate amendment, yet if they are germane and on the same subject under consideration, it has been held that you could put them in, and the Speakers of the House have so decided.

I will not quote the other decisions. They are all in the same line.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to submit to the consideration of the Chair a precedent that seems to me to be on all fours with the case now before the House. It is found in the Congressional Globe of the Thirty-eighth Congress, on page 1402, and is digested in Hinds's Manual of Parliamentary Precedents, on page 745, section 1420. In that case the House passed the bill. It went to the Senate. The Senate struck out all after the enacting clause and put in a bill of its own. It came back to the House and was nonconcurred in. Conferees were appointed, and the conferees agreed upon an entirely new bill, containing matter that was not at all contained in the original bill. On it coming again before the House on the report of the conferees, the question of order was raised by Mr. Holman, of Indiana, that the report did not come within the scope of the conference committee, that the conference committee had substituted an entirely new bill, and that so to do was entirely without their jurisdiction. Speaker Colfax on the question of order ruled as follows:

The Chair understands that the Senate adopted a substitute for the House bill. If the two Houses had agreed upon any particular language or any part of a section, the committee of conference could not change that; but the Senate having stricken out the bill of the House and inserted another one—the committee of conference have the right to strike out that and report a substitute in its stead. Two separate bills having been referred to the committee, they can take either one of them or a new bill entirely or a bill embracing part of either. They have a right to report any bill that is germane to the bills referred to them.

Which is exactly our case—

An appeal was then taken from this decision and it was sustained—yeas 80, nays 35.

I submit to the Chair that that precedent is absolutely conclusive of the question now before the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule on the question, and is impressed with the importance of it. There are but few countries, as the Chair now recalls, that have conference committees in their national legislative bodies, certainly none that have perfected them as we have in the United States. It is one of the vital instrumentalities in bringing the two Houses together and securing joint legislation. But there must be no abuse of that power. It will not do to allow matters not in contemplation by the two Houses, that are foreign to the questions being considered, to be inserted by the conference committee.

The decisions here are conflicting. The one just referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON], in reference to the Freedmen's Bureau, is "the widest open," so to speak, of the decisions; and yet in that case the new bill treated of the subject-matter of the original propositions, which was how to handle the interests of the freedmen, and one can readily see that the Chair might allow that to come in without being a violation of the rule.

Now, what are the facts in this particular case? We have incorporated here, according to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in charge of the bill, three entirely new items, not known to the action of the House, not considered in the action of the Senate. One is the Hancock item, which we find was known as Senate bill 52, and in the House as House bill 11208; another is the Horner item, known as H. R. 12590, and the other the Dashiell item, known as H. R. 13223, entirely separate and distinct bills, presenting different rights and different questions for the consideration of the Congress. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his ingenious argument, seeks to avoid the force of the objection made by the gentleman from Alabama because they were claims. But there are different claims. The House might be well pleased to insert and allow one claim and wholly opposed to another claim, and for the conference committee to step into outside matters, not before it by the action of the two Houses, and bring in a new claim that had never been considered by either House on the ground of its being germane, it seems to the Chair would open a very dangerous pathway to unwise legislation.

Now, while the Chair believes that the conference committee is a great instrumentality to bring the two Houses together, still the Chair would be very loath to open the door to allow any conference committee to usurp the prerogatives of either House; and while he has examined with care the several decisions, the weight of authority is in the line of his own feelings on this question; and even when submitted to a vote of the House, as was done in one case, the House sustained the views of the objecting party, Judge Holman.

The Chair is strongly of the opinion that to secure wise legislation caution should be observed in not allowing abuse of the powers of the conference committee, and this view invites sustaining the point of order in this case. The functions of a conference committee are such that they must consider a matter laid before them by the Congress. If it involves an amount of money they may increase it or cut it down; they may put limitations upon it. The functions of a conference committee are great and can be of infinite benefit to the House of Representatives. The feeling of the Chair is, then, that the door should not be opened beyond the scope and purpose of a conference committee. That is clear; and the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama. Therefore that brings us to the next thing for consideration.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair conclude.

Where does this leave this conference report? It has to be treated as a whole. The point of order defeats the conference report just exactly as if it were rejected by the House. That has already been held in one case—I think by Mr. Speaker Reed—that a point of order sustained against a conference report is equivalent to a rejection of the report by the House of Representatives on a vote. And it seems to the Chair that is where this conference report now stands.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the Speaker, I do not feel disposed to let this matter rest with the judgment of one man in the House. I am well satisfied that these matters are germane, and therefore I most respectfully appeal from the decision of the Speaker.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move to lay that appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the gentleman from Alabama moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. MAHON. In due time I will make another motion, Mr. Speaker. I will withdraw the appeal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraws his appeal.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend for a moment? [After a pause.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for another conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to further insist and ask for a conference. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman, if I may, touching the provision of the conference report which has been rejected, and is supposed germane to the Senate amendment, touching the Nevada claims, so called. I have just returned after an absence of some ten days, and this morning for the first time saw what was proposed. I have given it a hasty reading, and, in my judgment, in light of legislation that was had upon the urgent deficiency bill, I am inclined to think that legislation along the line of establishing an absolutely unfair precedent. It is the legality of the so-called Nevada claim, and any precedent would open the door for many hundreds of millions of dollars of claims for the various States, for bounties, extra pay, etc., paid by the States.

Now, I hope it shall not be necessary when this report comes back to antagonize the conference report. It is a question on which, as one member of the House, I am not in favor of—any legislation that would commit the United States where it is not now committed. We have had legislation to remove the statute of limitation, which we have done at this session of Congress, and I ask the gentleman if it will be necessary to offer a resolution of instructions to the committee.

Mr. MAHON. Let me explain to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. There was only this Territory of Nevada. This money was expended for sending troops to the front, just the same as was done in Illinois, Ohio, and all the other States. Now, New York made an effort, and succeeded in establishing the proposition, that under the act of 1861, where the Secretary of War authorized the borrowing of money to put troops into the field, and they issued their bonds for the same, that the interest of those bonds was to be an obligation against the Government.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MAHON. So that Pennsylvania secured hers, and in the last urgent deficiency bill a section was included for the benefit of the other States, and under this general section their claims are referred to the Secretary of War, there to be adjudicated under the principle laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the case of New York against the United States.

Now, if Nevada had been a State at the time this money was expended, she would not need this legislation; but she was at that time a Territory. The clause that the gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Appropriation Committee, put in would cover the State of Nevada exactly, but she was not, as I say, a State. She was brought into the Union a short time after the money had been expended and her troops put into the field. Under the call of 1861 she issued $100,000 worth of bonds and sent 1,180 men into the Army of the United States, exactly as did other States, although she was then a Territory. These bonds are still unpaid. Although under the law of 1861 the States were paid the principal or face of the bond, Nevada was not paid because the act did not include Territories.

Nevada asked for a direct appropriation of $424,000. We did not know what it was for, but if she borrowed that money, having issued her bonds under the call of the Secretary of War, then she ought to be treated the same as any other State although a Territory. As I say, if Nevada had been a State at the time she issued the bonds she would be covered by the clause in the urgent deficiency bill. This section is simply drawn to put the Territory of Nevada on all fours with the other States of this Union. This does not establish a precedent; it does not effect any other State. It puts Nevada on the same footing as any other State in the Union.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do the States get payment without being obliged to sue in the Court of Claims?

Mr. MAHON. Yes. The State of Nevada was brought into the Union after the war; brought in for a purpose, so that we might have sufficient votes to adopt amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have the act of 1861 and 1862, and I also have before me the legislation of this session of Congress, which seems to me is pretty broad:

> And the claims of like character arising under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stat., p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stat., p. 615), as interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of State of New York v. The United States, decided January 6, 1896 (160 U. S. Rep., p. 598), not heretofore allowed, or heretofore disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and if deemed necessary shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determination of disputed questions of law, to aid in the settlement of claims by the accounting officers.

Now, then, I understand the gentleman to say that Nevada at the time of this expenditure was a Territory.

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And that therefore the acts of 1861 and 1862 did not apply to the Territory of Nevada; that the object of the clause in the conference report which has gone out on a point of order was to place the present State of Nevada exactly in the same condition that New York and other States are in under the act of 1861 and the joint resolution of 1862, and to pay that State for expenditures made by the Territory precisely for the same class of claims, and no other, that the other States are entitled to payment for. I understand that to be the position of the gentleman.

Mr. MAHON. Yes. Now, will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to read the amendment in full? It is as follows:

> That the claim of the State of Nevada for costs, charges, and expenses incurred by the Territory of Nevada for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the insurrection against the United States, war of 1861-1865, under the act of Congress of July 27, 1861 (12 Stats., p. 276), and joint resolution of March 8, 1862 (12 Stats., 615), as interpreted and applied by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of New York against the United States, decided January 6, 1896 (160 U. S. Reports, p. 598), not heretofore allowed or disallowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, shall be examined, allowed, and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Now, that exactly follows the clause in the urgent deficiency bill except the concluding part.

Mr. CANNON. No; the gentleman has got something in there that is not in the report.

Mr. MAHON. I quoted it exactly from the urgent deficiency bill except the concluding part.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman puts in something that is not in the act, namely: The act that applied to the other States reads as follows:

Shall be reopened, examined, and allowed, and if deemed necessary shall be transmitted to the Court of Claims for findings of fact or determinations of disputed questions of law to aid in the settlement of the claims by the accounting officers.

Now, then, by the clause in the urgent deficiency bill which I have just read Congress keeps the whip hand. The accounting officers are only authorized to adjust the accounts of the States in the light of the New York decision, and they must certify to Congress for its information.

Now, the gentleman leaves out the Court of Claims, and in addition to that the gentleman proceeds "and paid out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." In other words, Congress loses the whip hand. I want to say to the gentleman that I fear, in the light of the act of 1882 that was passed touching Nevada, Texas, Kansas, and some other States, under which there was an adjudication and payment to Nevada, as well as to the other States, I am fearful, in the light of that subsequent decision, from a hasty examination, that this legislation may give, by legislative construction, something to Nevada that has been denied to the other States.

Illinois, New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and other States, many of them, if not all, paid from $100 to $500 bounty. Massachusetts gave as extra pay to all her soldiers in the war of the rebellion almost as much as they received from the Federal Government. Now, those bounties and that extra pay have never been reimbursed by the United States. In the light of what has passed, I am afraid the gentleman from Pennsylvania has got this provision broad enough to repay to the State of Nevada the extra pay which she paid——

Mr. MAHON. Did your State as a State pay bounties, or were the bounties paid by the municipalities?

Mr. CANNON. I think the bounties were paid by the State; but I am not sure about that.

Mr. MAHON. Your State paid $50 bounty.

Mr. CANNON. Now, if the Territory of Nevada was not covered by the act of 1861–62, I am perfectly willing that there should be legislation so covering it, although I believe that the State of Nevada, under an adjudication which has been made, has already been paid all that she is entitled to, unless she is entitled to something for interest.

Now, if the gentleman has the same object in view that I have, there can be no dispute between us.

Mr. MAHON. Certainly not.

Mr. CANNON. But I fear that the provision of this conference report may do something which on fuller examination will prove to be what the gentleman is not designing to do.

Mr. MAHON. Let me say to the gentleman that under that amendment the State of Nevada can not get a dollar beyond what was allowed to the State of New York by the decision which has been referred to. If Nevada did not make expenditures of the kind referred to in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, she gets nothing.

Mr. CANNON. Under the act of 1861–62?

Mr. MAHON. Yes. There has never been a case in the history of this Government where the Government ever appealed from the decision of an accounting officer. I do not think the gentleman can cite such a case.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, there have been a great many cases where the action of the accounting officer has been absolutely repudiated.

Mr. MAHON. I believe in every such case it was the State that made the appeal. It was with the view of protecting the Government that this provision was framed as it is.

Mr. CANNON. I want to put the State of Nevada on all fours with the State of New York under the legislation of 1861–62 and under the decision of the case of New York v. The United States. If Nevada is not on all fours with New York, I am willing and desirous of putting her in that position; but there I want to stop.

Mr. MAHON. Well, we shall have no trouble about that matter.

Mr. CANNON. I am perfectly willing to treat the Territory of Nevada in the same manner as if she had been a State.

My eye has just fallen upon the provision in reference to this matter. When this conference meets again from time to time members of the House may desire to present something for the gentleman's consideration or for the consideration of the committee; and I am perfectly willing not to embarrass him, because from what he says—and I have always found him a man of his word—there appears to be no difference between him and myself as to what is desirable in this legislation.

Mr. MAHON. The only question is as to the shape in which the provision shall be put.

Mr. NEWLANDS. As I understand the gentleman from Illinois, he is willing to waive the statute of limitations in regard to any claim that the State of Nevada may have.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. And he is willing also that the Territory of Nevada (now a State) shall be put on an equality with the various States that made these advances.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the language in this report exactly tallies with the act of 1861, which provided—

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the governor of any State, or to his duly authorized agents, the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for enrolling, subsisting, clothing, supplying, arming, equipping, paying, and transporting its troops employed in aiding to suppress the present insurrection against the United States, to be settled upon proper vouchers, to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

I repeat that this conference report simply follows the language of the original act; it prescribes the same method of procedure in the presentation of claims, it follows the same method of accounting, it follows the same form of appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend construe that as to Nevada this money was payable in gold, and that in making reimbursement now we would have to make up for the difference between gold and greenbacks.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have no construction in regard to that. I simply say that the provision embraced in the conference report renews the act of 1861–62, and makes it operative as to the State of Nevada (then a Territory) as it has been with reference to all the other States.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion at this point? In point of fact, the State of Nevada on its own motion paid its own troops twice what the troops of the State of New York were paid by the United States. Now, the United States, in settling with the States for claims of this kind, has paid only the same sums that were paid by the United States to other soldiers. The Government has not paid any of the bounties that various States paid to their troops, and it is the settled construction under the act that no such payments are due from the United States. I take it, then, that my friend does not desire that Nevada under this legislation should receive the difference between greenbacks and gold or should receive pay to the extent of double the amount that the United States paid its own soldiers. If so, my friend and myself do not agree about it, and I am merely talking about it so that if we can now by this discussion and comparison of notes in the House indicate the principles upon which this matter should be settled, it would save us perhaps great trouble when the conference report comes in for adoption.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I am not authorized to waive any part of the claim of the State of Nevada. I presume if this becomes law it will go before the accounting officers of the Treasury and will be determined by them just as the claims of other States have been. I believe that entire claim to be a just claim, and I am willing to meet the gentleman or anyone who opposes it at the proper time on the floor of this House in debate. I do not think this is, however, the time to go into all the intricacies of these claims unless the gentleman wishes to force the discussion now.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he is willing to take the substance of that provision in the urgent deficiency bill that applies to all the other States and make it apply to the State of Nevada?

Mr. MAHON. The only change we would have to make would be to put in what is stricken out of that section in the urgent deficiency bill. We followed it except that we struck that out. If the gentleman examines the amendment, he will find that we followed it exactly.

Mr. CANNON. He is willing to take that modification?

Mr. MAHON. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to further insist on disagreements to the amendment of the Senate and ask for a conference.

Mr. ROBB rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MAHON. No; I can not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. UNDERWOOD) there were—ayes 100, noes 19.

The SPEAKER. The motion prevails, and the Chair appoints the following conferees on the part of the House: Messrs. MAHON, GIBSON, and SIMS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask recognition to move instructions to the conferees.

The SPEAKER. That would be in order before the appointment of the conferees and after the conference had been ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the conference has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman states that he was rising to get the attention of the Chair, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was; I desired to move instructions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his instructions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Clerk to take it down. I desire to move that the conference be instructed not to agree to what is known as the Selfridge board findings in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the conferees be instructed not to agree to what is known as the Selfridge board findings in the Senate amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to occupy any great space of time, but I just wish a few words.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MAHON. I make the point of order that this is not in order after the conferees have been appointed.

The SPEAKER. That part of the statement of the Chair was withdrawn on the statement that the gentleman was trying to get recognition. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have discussed the merits and demerits of the Selfridge board findings over a week ago. It has been printed in the RECORD. I do not know that I can throw any more new light on the proposition by going into a further discussion of the question, but I wish to say this, that when we had this bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, considering this question of the Selfridge board findings, the House debated the question. It was considered and voted on, and by a vote on the floor of this House the House rejected the Selfridge board findings by a majority of the House. That was virtually an instruction to the conferees of the House not to agree to the Senate amendment in that particular. It may not have been a direct instruction, but it certainly amounted to an instruction.

Now, with that situation staring the conferees in the face, a majority of the conferees—Mr. SOMS did not sign the report—did go into conference with the Senate; did at once agree to accept the entire Senate bill, rejecting the virtual instructions of the House, bringing back this bill before the House on a unanimous conference report, where, if it had not been knocked out by a point of order, it would have been impossible for this House to take up the bill item by item and give it consideration. We have been required to vote for the bill as a whole under the report brought in here by the conference committee. Notwithstanding the fact that the House had rejected these claims, the conference committee brought them back into this House under the report just rejected on a point of order without giving the House any opportunity whatever for a separate vote in the matter. Now, I say that under those circumstances the House is justified and ought to adopt instructions directing these conferees not to agree to those Selfridge board findings. Let them come in and stand up before the Senate conferees and tell the Senate that the House is not willing to pass that portion of the bill, and then if they find they can not get the Senate to recede they can properly come back here and report the facts to the House, where we will have an opportunity to further consider these claims on their merits without being tied up with the other claims in the bill, and give them a a separate consideration.

Now, I am not going into a full discussion of the merits or demerits of the Selfridge board claims. I do not think they ought to be paid. There is no justification for them. They claim that the plans were changed, and therefore that the contractors lost money. The record does not sustain them. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury at the time and the report of Senator Grimes, chairman of the Committee on Claims of the Senate at the time, both state that there had been no change whatever in the plans and that it was merely an appeal to the generosity of Congress to pay these claims. They have been rejected for forty years, and now they come here asking you to give them between a million and a million and a half of dollars to pay claims that at the time when they were new and people understood the facts had been thoroughly digested and rejected. I therefore think that under these circumstances the House is justified in instructing the conferees, and ought to instruct the conferees in this case not to agree to these claims.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to make any reply. This matter has been discussed over and over in this House. The Senate conferees state that they will not recede under any consideration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to instruct the conferees. As many as favor the motion will say "aye;" those opposed, "no."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MAHON) there were—ayes 67, noes 64.

Mr. ROBERTS. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the conferees be instructed not to agree to what are known as the Selfridge claims on this bill, and on that motion the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 71, answered "present" 20, not voting 148, as follows:

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Speaker, I forgot for a moment that I was paired with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. TAWNEY. I voted "yea." I desire to be recorded as "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees on the bill: Mr. MAHON, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. SIMS.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and pending that motion, I ask my colleague if he has any suggestion to make in reference to the limitation of time for general debate.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. There are a number of gentlemen on this side who desire to speak, and I suggest six hours on a side for general debate.

Mr. FOSS. I will say to my friend I can not use one-third of that on this side, so far as I have been able to hear from members on this side of the House, and I would suggest to him that we do not fix any limitation for the present, but go into Committee of the Whole and have general debate for the rest of the afternoon, he to control one half of the time and the chairman of the committee to control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, asks that this day be devoted to general debate, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] to control one half of the time and he the other half, this not to be understood as limiting general debate. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 14046, the naval appropriation bill.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14046, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor, on behalf of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to report and call up at this time for the consideration of the committee this bill, known as the naval appropriation bill, which makes appropriation for the maintenance of the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903. I have set forth in the report, which is available to all members of the House, an exhaustive statement as to every item appropriated in this bill, to which I will ask members of the House to make reference; and if there are any questions which any member desires to ask me in reference to the bill, either now or in the course of general debate, I will be most happy to answer them, provided they are not too difficult. But there are some general matters included in this bill which I think it wise at this time to call to the attention of the House.

In the first place, let us consider the size of the bill. The amount carried by this bill is $77,659,386.63. This is a decrease from the bill of last year to the amount of $442,404.77. Now, the Committee on Naval Affairs have had under consideration for a number of months in the committee room the preparation of this bill. They have been diligently at work laboring in a measure to cut down the appropriations, providing for the economical administration of the naval establishment.

Our estimates were unusual this year. The original estimates sent here by the Navy Department at the beginning of Congress amounted to $98,000,000. To this afterwards came supplemental estimates of a million and one-half dollars, and then additional estimates from time to time from the Secretary of the Navy amounting to five million more. So that the total estimates for the naval establishment this year coming from the Department through the regular channels to the Committee on Naval Affairs, all told, original, supplemental, and additional, amounted in all to $105,000,000.

These estimates the committee have cut down to the extent of $27,405,298. I may say that that fact alone is worth commenting upon, entailing, as it did, laborious consideration and the careful investigation which has been given to the subject of naval affairs in the committee room.

Now, these reductions in the estimates were principally from public works. The estimates under the Bureau of Yards and Docks for public works called for $20,781,375, but the committee thought it wise to reduce this and recommended appropriations to the amount of $6,561,075, showing a decrease under the head of "Public works" in the Bureau of Yards and Docks of $14,220,000. Under the Bureau of Ordnance there was a decrease of $333,000. Under "Public works," for the Naval Academy, a decrease of $1,000,000; under "Public works," Bureau of Ordnance, $1,065,000; under the Bureau of Equipment, $1,870,000; under the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts a decrease of $570,000; under the Bureau of Construction and Repair, $1,340,000; under the Bureau of Steam Engineering, $300,000; under the head of "Increase of Navy," $1,000,000. The balance of deductions is made up from reductions from supplemental and additional estimates.

The next question I wish to call to the attention of members of the committee is this: We have made provision here for more men. As everyone will see, when we are building ships it is necessary also to make provision for additional men. This matter was called to the attention of the committee by the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation and by the Secretary in his annual report. Both the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation and the Secretary of the Navy joined in the recommendation for 3,000 additional men, and this recommendation is made by your committee. It will be necessary, as we go on building ships, to provide, from time to time, of course, for an increased number of men and also an increased number of officers. The two go hand in hand together, and it is necessary to provide for more men in advance of the construction of ships because it takes two and three years to properly train the men so that they can successfully man the ships. Take, for instance, the ships now under construction, and it will require about 14,000 additional men to properly man them. Of this number we have already provided in the last appropriation bill for 5,000 men and this year for 3,000 more, and it will be necessary to provide for 6,000 more before the time of the completion of the ships.

Now, there is another phase of this bill which I desire to call attention of the members to, and that is the necessity for more officers. The Chief of the Bureau of Navigation in his report sets out that it will be necessary by the time the present ships now in process of construction are completed to have at least a thousand men to successfully officer them. Now, when the committee started in on the consideration of this question, they called upon the Department to furnish an itemized list of the number of officers needed for each ship, and that list or statement you will find in the report on page 14, giving the names of the ship and the number of officers for each ship.

The committee also, at the same time, called on the Department for a statement as to what our officers were doing at the present time, whether on sea or shore duty, and you will find the statement upon page 15 of the report to this effect: The total number of line officers to-day in the Navy is 1,017, including 124 cadets now at sea, and who have not as yet received their commissions. Of this number there are 993 eligible for sea duty. Of this number 709 are performing duty on vessels or are beyond the seas, 272 performing duty on shore. Now, it will be seen that there are comparatively few officers to officer our ships which are now in process of building.

And if we are to have the officers ready when the ships are completed, it is necessary for us now to make provision for more officers. Why? Because it takes four years—yes, six years—to train officers. They must have an education at the Naval Academy, which requires four years, and then two years of sea service before receiving their commissions. So in this bill the committee have recommended a provision for an increase of officers to the extent of 500—a temporary provision, because it operates only for the coming four years. It is believed that when the present law, which was modified a year or so ago, by which every member of the House appoints a cadet once in four years instead of once in six years, has had time to operate, that law will provide for the officers needed for our growing Navy.

Now, as I say, this bill provides for the appointment of 500 additional cadets, covering a period of four years. The first year the Senators are to make appointments, one each. The President is given the appointment of 6 cadets a year, or 24 cadets covering the four years; and then during the succeeding three years each member of the House will have an additional appointment. In that way we make up the number of 500 additional cadets.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. At what date will a member have the right to make an appointment?

Mr. FOSS. That will be determined by the Navy Department—probably by lot.

Mr. METCALF. Can the gentleman tell us how many officers are stationed at the private shipbuilding yards of the country?

Mr. FOSS. At present?

Mr. METCALF. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSS. No; I do not know.

Mr. LANDIS. After these cadets appointed in this manner go out, is provision made for appointments to keep up the number?

Mr. FOSS. Well, this provision, as I say, is temporary and ceases to operate at the end of four years. The present law operates continuously—during the coming four years and after that.

Mr. LANDIS. And unless some additional legislation——

Mr. FOSS. Unless some additional legislation is had, that will be the only law in existence to give us more officers after the expiration of this temporary provision. But the committee believe, or rather hope, that the present law will be sufficient to produce enough officers for the increasing Navy.

Mr. LANDIS. Then, after the expiration of this temporary provision, things will drop back to the normal condition?

Mr. FOSS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. What provision is there in the bill for the construction of new ships at Government navy-yards?

Mr. FOSS. I will say to my friend that I shall reach that question in a moment or two.

Now, I have touched upon the question of more men and more officers, and have pointed out the recommendations of the committee in these respects. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH] calls my attention to the ships. We have provided in this bill for the increase of the Navy by the construction of 2 battle ships, 2 armored cruisers, and 2 gunboats. We are to-day building 8 battle ships. We have more than half of them completed. We are building 6 armored cruisers, about one-fourth of which are completed. We are building 9 protected cruisers, 5 of which are more than half completed. We have 9 torpedo boats nearly completed and 7 submarines nearly finished.

I might say that the committee have recommended the building of 2 battle ships and 2 armored cruisers in the line of what might be called a suggestion from Congress last year. It will be remembered that in the last naval appropriation bill Congress enacted a provision calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to report upon the cost of 2 battle ships and 2 armored cruisers. I will not read the provision, but the Secretary of the Navy was called upon to submit a report upon the whole subject, which he has already done and which any member can refer to if he desires.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How much are they to cost?

Mr. FOSS. The cost of these ships, in accordance with plans recommended by the Board of Construction, amounts in all to about $30,000,000. The battle ships, which will be ships of 16,000 tons each—the largest battle ships of any that we have—will cost $7,532,000 apiece.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How does that compare with the cost of constructing such vessels heretofore?

Mr. FOSS. Our battle ships heretofore have cost anywhere from $6,000,000 to six and a half million dollars.

A MEMBER. Inclusive of ordnance?

Mr. FOSS. Inclusive of everything; that is the completed cost.

Now, the armored cruisers will cost $6,700,000 apiece, and the gunboats $510,000 apiece, making in all a total cost for 2 first-class battle ships, 2 armored cruisers, and 2 gunboats approximately $29,500,000.

Now, there are several boards in the Navy Department whose business it is to recommend naval programmes. One is the general board. They have recommended the building of something like 35 ships. Then there is the Board of Construction, which recommended to the Secretary of the Navy the building of about 40 ships. And the Secretary of the Navy made a recommendation, I think, calling for 22 ships in number. I have not counted them up. He asked for 3 first-class battle ships, 2 first-class armored cruisers, 3 gunboats of 6,000 tons displacement, 3 gunboats of 2,000 tons displacement, 3 picket boats of 600 tons displacement, 3 steel training ships of about 2,000 tons displacement, 1 collier of 15,000 tons, and 4 tugboats, and while the recommendations of the different boards have been had, yet it must be remembered, of course, that the men who recommend them are naval officers ambitious for the profession in which they are engaged and are desirous of seeing our Navy built up as fast and speedily as possible; but this committee—and I refer to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union—composed of the representatives of the American people, have to decide for the people themselves as to how far and how fast we shall pursue the policy of building up the American Navy.

Now, in view of the fact that Congress intimated in the appropriation bill of last year that it was its wish that the Secretary of the Navy should report only upon two battle ships and two armored cruisers, the Committee on Naval Affairs did not think it wise to make any further recommendation, and that is the reason why we come here with a programme to-day of two battle ships and two armored cruisers and two gunboats, in all, a total tonnage of 63,000 tons, requiring an appropriation of $30,000,000, not in this bill, but in subsequent bills, to construct them, because we believe that we are carrying out the intimation and suggestion of Congress in the appropriation bill of last year. Now, we have had greater programmes than this in years past. Under the naval appropriation bill of March 3, 1899, we provided for a total tonnage that year of ships to the amount of 104,000 tons, and under the appropriation bill passed June 7, 1900, we made the further increase in ships to the amount of 99,920 tons. The programme this year, if it pass by the committee and the House and Congress, will add only 63,000 tons to the tonnage of our Navy; and so I say to you that it is a moderate increase, it is a healthy increase, but I believe that it is none too large if we are to continue the policy of building up the American Navy, and building it up in such strength and power as to maintain the honor of our country and to back up our foreign policy in every port and harbor throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, if it will not interrupt the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to ask him whether or not the building of these ships in the navy-yards of the United States is an experiment. I notice by the report, on page 19, that it states "that it is believed by your committee that nothing short of experiment of this kind will settle the question that affects many minds." Is this an experiment or has it been tried before, and if so, whether it was successful?

Mr. FOSS. It has been tried before, and I will reach the discussion of that question a little later. I want, in the first place, to call the attention of the committee to the present condition of the American Navy. In the report which I have the honor to make for the committee, after presenting a table of the number of ships that have already been built and which are now building, I made this statement, which has attracted, I may say, some little public attention:

It will be seen from the above table that while we have built and are building, all told, 138 ships, yet comparatively few of them have any real fighting value. Our naval prowess lies almost entirely in our 18 battle ships, 8 armored cruisers, and 21 protected cruisers. The rest of our ships would cut but little figure in actual warfare. Ships of the battle line practically alone determine the naval strength of a nation.

I mean by that, not ships of the battle line in the technical and historical sense, because that would refer simply to battle ships, but ships of the battle line in the larger and broader sense, including armored cruisers and protected cruisers. Now, I say that while we have built 138 ships, and are building them to-day, yet we have not a navy of which we can boast. We have only 10 battle ships already built and 8 under construction, and yet Secretary Tracy said in one of his reports that we have no business to consider that we had a navy until we have at least 20 battle ships. We have a good many ships upon the list of vessels which any of you can see if you will read the reports of the Navy Department, but most of these boats are peace boats, and in this connection I do not wish to have you take my statement alone, but take the statement of one of the ablest of our naval authorities, the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, Admiral Charles O'Neil. In a speech which he made before the New York Yacht Club not long ago he said something about the strength of our present Navy. Said he:

It might be advisable to fool other nations if we could with regard to our naval strength, but we surely do not want to fool ourselves, and a little introspection may be beneficial even if our national pride suffers somewhat in comparison.

Now let us see exactly how we stand:

The Navy list of January 1, 1902, contains the names of 243 completed vessels and of 60 in process of construction, a total of 303 vessels, and a very respectable showing, so far as numbers go. The question is, What are these 303 vessels and how many of them have any real military value? Of the completed vessels I find that 8 are unserviceable wooden ships of ancient date, which will probably soon be sold to the highest bidder. One is an old iron, paddle-wheel steamer, the Monocacy, which has been in Chinese waters for over thirty years and ought to have been in the scrap heap years ago. One is the Spanish cruiser Reina Mercedes, which was sunk by the Spaniards at Santiago de Cuba, was afterwards raised, and of which it is proposed to make a sailing training ship; 6 are old wooden frigates, used for receiving ships; 39 are tugboats; 1 is the so-called dynamite cruiser Vesuvius, having no military value; 1 is the ram Katahdin, a pronounced failure; 5 are purchased steamers, used as training ships for landsmen and having no military value; 8 are old-fashioned wooden sailing sloops of war, used by the Naval Militia and for State marine schools; 2 are wooden training ships for apprentices; 1 is a small sailing practice vessel for the cadets at Annapolis; 6 are old single-turretted monitors, with cast-iron, smooth-bore guns, relics of the civil war and of no value; 16 are colliers; 10 are supply vessels, tank steamers, and refrigerating ships; 48 are little gunboats, varying from 400 to 500 tons, mostly captured or bought in the Philippines, and 28 are torpedo boats, only useful for special purposes. That is to say, that 161 of the 242 completed vessels now on the Navy list have practically no fighting qualities; in fact, absolutely none, if we may except the torpedo boats.

Of the 62 remaining vessels, 10 are battle ships; 2, the New York and Brooklyn, are armored cruisers; 14 are second and third class cruisers like the Chicago, Baltimore, Cincinnati, and Detroit; 30 are small cruisers and gunboats like the Yorktown, Nashville, and others; and 6 are double-turreted monitors, suitable only for harbor defense.

Of these 62 vessels, at least 30 are so insignificant that they would cut but little figure in a war with any strong power. Thus it will be seen that our effective fighting power to-day is about 32 vessels; hence we can lay no claim to any great importance as yet as a naval power.

Then he goes on and speaks of the vessels which we are now building.

Fortunately—

He says—

we have a very respectable building programme now under way, as the ships now building will equal in fighting efficiency all the rest of the Navy. Of the 60 vessels now under construction, 8 are first-class battle ships; 3 are large armored cruisers, much more powerful than the New York; 6 are partially protected cruisers of 3,200 tons displacement; 4 are harbor-defense monitors; 16 are torpedo-boat destroyers; 10 are torpedo boats, and 7 submarine boats.

We may safely add 27 of the above vessels to our 32 of to-day, which will, in about three years' time, give us 59 good fighting vessels, 18 of which will be battle ships, 8 armored cruisers, 10 monitors, and about 23 protected and partially protected cruisers; and we shall also have about 57 torpedo vessels and a lot of small gunboats and miscellaneous auxiliary craft, useful in their proper sphere.

From the foregoing it will be seen that we are deficient in powerful fighting vessels, and it behooves us to push on with the construction of battle ships and armored cruisers until we have a respectable number of each, not wasting our energies or money on a lot more miscellaneous small craft until we have accomplished the more important construction.

And that recommendation is in line with that of this committee. We recommend two great battle ships, the largest we have ever built, ships the plans for which have already attracted the eyes of the naval authorities of the countries of the world, and in addition to that, two great armored cruisers, practically battle ships; and then we have put in a couple of small gunboats. But the policy of the committee, if I can in any measure speak for it, I think, is almost unanimously for putting the people's money into real fighting ships, ships of the battle line, and not into a whole lot of peace boats which do not amount to anything at all.

Now, I know that there are some—we hear it here and there and everywhere—who think that just because we whipped Spain in a fight of a hundred days and only lost a single life we could wipe out the fleets of the navies of the world. There is an impression which has gone out that the American Navy is strong and mighty and powerful. Yes; it is, so far as it goes. I believe we have better officers, better men, and that our ships, ship for ship, are better than those of any navy in the world. But do not let us delude ourselves with the thought that because we whipped a little nation, which had only a little navy, therefore we can whip anything that comes along. Why, it would have been our everlasting shame if our two fleets at Manila and Santiago had not sunk both of the Spanish fleets. Why? Because they were superior; they had a greater tonnage, each of them. I have here a statement which I propose to insert in the RECORD, showing the relative comparison of the two fleets at the battle of Manila and the battle of Santiago, and while I would not for a single moment disparage the bravery and the courage of our American officers and men and the value of our ships, yet, if there is any lesson to be learned from the Spanish-American war, it is that superior men, superior ships—in tonnage, in armament, and in armor—superior gunnery, and superior marksmanship will win in the future as they have won in the past. [Applause.]

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION, OFFICE OF NAVAL INTELLIGENCE.
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1902.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of the 29th ultimo for information relative to the size of the two fleets, Spanish and American, at the battles of Manila Bay and Santiago, I have the honor to transmit herewith a memorandum which contains the desired data.

Very respectfully,
J. H. GIBBONS,
Lieutenant-Commander, U. S. Navy,
Acting Chief Intelligence Officer.

Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

ENGAGEMENT IN MANILA BAY, MAY 1, 1898.

APRIL 30, 1902.

From the following tables it will be seen that the Spanish had a numerical superiority in ships and men. The data for the Spanish force is taken from Estado General de la Armada for 1898, and, as the complements there given are on a peace footing, it is reasonable to suppose that the numbers are a low estimate.

Leaving aside shore batteries and submarine defenses, there can be no question as to the superiority of the American ships and armaments over the Spanish. As to the extent of this superiority, the following comparison of armaments of the two fleets is given:

So the lesson that comes to us, as the result of our recent war with Spain, is not to stop building, but to build onward and upward the American Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to another question. We have provided in this bill for a naval programme which I say, in my judgment and the judgment of the committee, is a healthy one, a conservative one, on the lines of our past policy, and a naval programme which I think will meet with approval everywhere throughout the country. But it is necessary in this bill to provide also how these ships shall be constructed. Heretofore it has been the policy of our country, with but few exceptions, to construct our ships in private yards, because I think it has been the consensus of public opinion that they could be constructed more cheaply there than in our Government navy-yards.

Many of you have received a great deal of literature upon this question of the construction of ships in Government navy-yards. I have some of it here. You may recognize it, perhaps, as I hold it up for you to look at. These cards have been sent to members of Congress, calling their attention from time to time to the wisdom of constructing ships in Government navy-yards. Now, I desire to say a few words upon this question. In the first place, I desire to call your attention to the fact that all of these cards come from the Chamber of Commerce of Vallejo, Cal. It was my pleasure to visit that little city last summer, and I was very pleasantly entertained there. They are very much interested in building ships in Government navy-yards there. Why? I will say, in the first place, that this is a city of about 7,000 population. It has comparatively few industries of its own.

Most of the people or laboring men there depend absolutely for employment upon the navy-yard across the river. They are naturally in favor of building ships in Government navy-yards. They are naturally anxious to call attention of members of Congress to this. They would not only like to build one ship there, but they would like to build the whole American Navy there. Why? Because, as I say, they are absolutely dependent upon Government work in order to feed, clothe, and to keep themselves and their families alive. That is an honest, legitimate ambition. I have nothing to say against it, but I have something to say against the fallacious statements and misrepresentations of fact which have been sent out upon these cards to members of Congress. If they contained the truth I would not say anything. But when they try to influence your vote and mine with misstatements of fact I think it is only proper that somebody should call attention to the matter.

Mr. METCALF. Do I understand the gentleman to say the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce has made misstatements as to the condition of the Navy?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; some misstatements.

Mr. METCALF. I wish you would point out where any misstatements have been made.

Mr. FOSS. Now, here is a card which has been sent out by the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce:

From the Paymaster-General of the Navy's report for 1899, page 36, we find the value of navy-yard plants which are used for the repairing of vessels to be $42,395,136. There has since then been appropriated $51,893,297, making the enormous sum of $94,288,433. The Bureau of Yards and Docks has recommended to this Congress that $18,786,075 additional be appropriated, making in all $113,074,508.

As the Bureau of Yards and Docks have all the quay walls, dry docks, sidewalks, buildings, and other improvements built by contract (see Secretary of the Navy's report for 1901, pages 219 to 245), it is the incentive for the contractors to help the Bureau build up the plants.

Value of plants, January 1, 1902.

Portsmouth, N. H	$6,929,080
Boston	17,849,761
Brooklyn	29,021,068
Philadelphia	9,344,963
Norfolk	9,810,610
Port Royal	3,427,910
Pensacola	2,595,475
Mare Island	11,178,752
Bremerton	3,060,994
Algiers	1,470,000
	94,288,433
Additional appropriations asked for	18,786,075
Total valuation to date	113,074,508

This vast sum represents more money than is invested in all the shipbuilding plants of this country engaged in the building of Government ships. Those in authority claim the navy-yards can not build battle ships because of the lack of the proper facilities, notwithstanding the expenditure of this enormous sum for such purposes.

From the Paymaster-General of the Navy's report for 1901 we find under the heading:

STATEMENT D.

Statement showing expenditures for maintenance and improvements at the several naval stations during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901:

Total cost of maintenance per year	14,246,781
Repairs to vessels per year, Title D	4,157,266
Amount expended per year	18,404,047

There is no record of any new construction work having been done.

This is a startling summary to place before the country; a plant costing $113,074,510, in operation, expending $18,404,047 annually, to produce $4,157,266 in results.

The navy-yards at the present time are used for no other purpose but that of repairing vessels; they should also be engaged in building the new Navy, instead of being comparatively idle as they now are. Every private yard in this country is congested with work; every Government contract ship under construction is from twenty months to three years behind contract time. The lobby of the combine pleaded with the last Congress to appropriate no more money for the increase of the Navy for that session because they could not build what they already had under construction.

If there were $20,000,000 worth of new construction work at the navy-yards, the cost for maintenance would not be greater than it now is.

If the Government can not build battle ships in the plants represented by this immense investment, don't you think that it is time to close the navy-yards or get some one else to run them?

And here is a comment, not of mine, but the comment of Admiral Bowles, Chief Constructor of the American Navy, the head of the Bureau:

This card—

Says Admiral Bowles—

alleging that the Government has a plant in operation costing $113,000,000, spending $18,000,000 annually to produce $4,000,000 in results, is a perversion of the figures. The Paymaster General's report (page 814 of the Secretary's report of 1899) gives the appraised value of the navy-yards and naval stations at that date as $42,395,136, about 90 per cent of which is real estate and over $20,000,000 of which is the value of the real estate of the Brooklyn Navy-Yard. In order to make up the difference between this and $113,000,000 the makers of this card have added all the appropriations for improvements to the navy-yards made since 1899—

And in this connection I will say upon my own authority, they have added the estimates for this year to the amount of $18,786,000, which we have reduced to $6,500,000 in order to make up this $113,000,000.

The makers of this card—

have added all the appropriations for improvements to the navy-yards made since 1899, a great portion of which is not yet expended, and even if it were, can not be added to the previous appraisal to obtain the present value.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. FOSS. Wait until I get through with this. And not only that, but these cards have gone upon the theory and supposition that the chief and only business of a navy-yard is to repair ships. Well, now, that is not the fact. Admiral Bowles says a very large proportion—considerably more than one-half—of the value of the navy-yards has no relation to their value as industrial establishments for doing work in the construction and repair of vessels, and relates to the functions of the navy-yards as arsenals and depots for the maintenance of public property in the way of guns, ammunition, food, and stores of all kinds, which have to do with the maintaining and keeping of the naval supplies, and is entirely apart from the industrial and mechanical business of construction and repair. This will be clear to you when I explain that at the date of appraisal, in 1899, the total value of the machinery plant of the navy-yards doing repair work amounted to less than 10 per cent of their total value.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman kindly state the date of that card?

Mr. FOSS. I can not say; there is no date on the inside.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some time this year?

Mr. FOSS. It is a card I received during the last few months.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that Admiral Bowles refers to an appraisal made in 1899. I call the attention to the appraisal given in his own report, showing the value June 30, 1901, that the total value of all the yards, machinery, and equipment aggregates $78,900,000; and eliminating the foreign—if we can call them foreign—naval stations, the chairman's own reports bring the value of these plants to over $70,000,000.

Mr. METCALF. Nearly $80,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It brings it up to $30,000,000 more than what the gentleman says Admiral Bowles puts it at.

Mr. FOSS. That takes in the foreign stations.

Mr. METCALF. It takes them all in.

Mr. FOSS. In the card you will find that this is the basis for their statement that has been sent out; i. e., they quote from exactly the same report, from the Paymaster-General of the Navy report in 1899, page 34, where we find the value of the navy-yard plants used for repairing vessels put at $42,395,000. Admiral Bowles has taken their card and shown from their own card that they have perverted facts.

Mr. RIXEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FOSS. I prefer to go along now.

Mr. RIXEY. I simply wanted to know if the statement of Admiral Bowles was a public document?

Mr. FOSS. It will be in to-morrow's RECORD; it has not been published yet. Now, as to another statement——

Mr. METCALF. Will the gentleman pardon me? In fairness, having criticised the statement sent out by the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce, I ask that he publish this card for the purpose of showing whether or not any misstatement has been made. I think it is but fair that that should go into the RECORD.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is another card which has been sent out by the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce, and upon it you will see the picture of two ships, one the Monterey and the other the Monadnock. The Monterey was built at the Union Iron Works, and the Monadnock was built at Mare Island Navy-Yard.

Now, they made the statement on this card that the difference in cost to date as between these two vessels which they say are very nearly alike, but upon which there is justly a great difference of opinion, that the difference in cost to date is $530,000 in favor of the ship built at the Mare Island Navy-Yard. Now, I want to read you what Admiral Bowles, the chief constructor in the Navy, says about that:

MEMORANDUM FOR THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 21, 1902.

In regard to the comparative statements of the cost of the Monadnock, built by the Government, and the Monterey, built by contract, the principal error made in the statements on these cards consists in the entire omission of the amounts expended by the Government on the Monadnock in the construction of the hull and machinery up to the time that the vessel was turned over to the Mare Island Navy-Yard for completion, under the authority granted by the act of March 3, 1883, so that the statements of cost given by the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce include only the amounts expended subsequent to that date. An accurate statement of the comparative cost of the hull and machinery of the Monadnock and Monterey is given below, and instead of showing that the Monadnock was built at the navy-yard for $530,981 less than the Union Iron Works built the Monterey, on the contrary the Monadnock cost $337,199.16 more than the Monterey for corresponding items.

Under the circumstances, it is not necessary to cumber this account with any description of the differences existing between the vessels which make the Monterey a much more valuable and expensive ship if contemporaneously built.

F. T. BOWLES,
Chief Constructor United States Navy.

Mr. METCALF. That statement made in that card was taken from Senate Document 175, furnished by the Secretary of the Navy, and they have subsequently corrected it in another card giving the absolute cost of the ship to the Government. The gentleman from Illinois must have received that subsequent card and statement.

Mr. FOSS. No; I have not received it.

Mr. METCALF. I have received it, and I will explain it at the proper time.

Mr. FOSS. Now, there is another matter——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Before the gentleman passes from that point, will he say whether it is stated there that the cost of undoing work which had been done was estimated by one of the naval constructors as greater than the cost of doing the work from the beginning?

Mr. FOSS. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask the gentleman whether it does not appear from that card that a naval constructor has given it as his opinion that tearing out the work which had been done by contract amounted practically to as much, if not more, than the building of the entire ship anew.

Mr. FOSS. I do not find that statement here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If that statement is made, I think the House should know it.

Mr. FOSS. Here is the card. If the gentleman can find it there, well and good.

Now, here is another card which has been sent out, showing the cost of different vessels.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSS. I ask unanimous consent that I may finish my remarks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that the gentleman be allowed to proceed until he has concluded his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. That consent is unnecessary, as the gentleman controls the time himself.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will go on and tell us all he can about this bill.

Mr. FOSS. Here is another card showing the cost of the different vessels. Admiral Bowles has taken one of these cards which has been sent to members of Congress and furnishes this statement thereon. Here is the card:

1901.
Virginia			Newport		6,176,612	15,014	404
Pennsylvania			Cramp		5,236,413	14,014	373

We find from the accompanying table that the prices of finished ships have fallen from $639 per ton in 1890, when the Union and the Cramps had no opposition, to $451 in 1898, when they had the competition of the Newport News, and to $404 per ton in 1901, when they had the competition of the Bath Iron Works, Fore River Ship Company, the Morans, and the Newport News.

Or, had they built the Ohio in 1890 instead of in 1898, and had charged for her the same price that they charged for building the Oregon, viz, $639 per ton, she would have cost $7,939,160 instead of $5,612,837, a difference of $2,327,323.

We take the hull and machinery as a basis to figure the profit to the contractor, as the price of armor does not figure in the building. It is said that the Newport News built the hull and machinery of the Kentucky for about cost, which is $317 per ton. Granting this to be true, we find that the Union Iron Works charged $576 per ton for the Oregon, a profit of $1,428,079. Adding speed premium, $175,000, will make a total profit of $1,603,079 on the hull and machinery.

Profit on the Massachusetts, adding speed premium, $100,000, makes a net profit of $1,569,851. Profit on the Indiana, speed premium of $38,500, makes a net profit of $1,392,304. There were, in addition to these figures, from $150,000 to $250,000 paid as extras on the hull and machinery, principally for changes, the profit on which was not less than two-thirds. This should be added to their net profits as stated above.

Profit on the Iowa, $984,652. Add speed premium of $217,420 makes a net profit of $1,202,072.

From 1890 to 1901 the prices paid for material and wages has been steadily increasing, while the prices charged by the contractors for finished ships has been steadily decreasing.

From the above you can see what competition has done for the Government.

Do you wonder that the contractors oppose the building of battle ships in the navy-yards? We do not, for we know the profits they have made in the past.

They do not want the competition of the navy-yards.

Why not divide the profits with the horny-handed sons of toil instead of giving it all to the favored few? The latter are now rich enough.

Here is the statement of Admiral Bowles:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1902.

This card gives the cost of each of the battle ships, per gross ton, which is an unsuitable method of comparison, as the gross tonnage merely represents the cubical capacity of the hull, and therefore is not a measure of the contract work.

I inclose a table of cost of battle ships, based upon the contract weight, exclusive of armor and armament—that is, the cost per ton is the cost per ton of weight contracted for in the hull, machinery, and fittings. Down to the Wisconsin in this table the figures are the actual returned cost—that is, including the contract price and extras. From the Maine to the Pennsylvania it is the contract price alone, and the amounts will probably show, when completed, from $20 to $30 more per ton. It is true that the Kearsarge and Kentucky were built at probably less than cost, and the price, $385 per ton, certainly involves no profit. The first battle ships, Oregon, Massachusetts, and Indiana, must have brought a considerable profit to the builders, but since their time the profits have not been unreasonable, and this table clearly shows the advantages of competition.

Chief Constructor United States Navy.

Now, here are some more cards which have been sent out.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. As to some of these ships, was not a part of the hull built in Europe and brought over here?

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman may refer to two ships which were bought during the Spanish war—the Albany and the New Orleans, which were built at Sir William Thomson's works, I think.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My information—given, I believe, on some of these cards—is that the machinery or some part of some of these vessels was bought in some foreign country. Was it the Texas?

Mr. FOSS. The plans of the Texas were designed by an Englishman in the employ of Sir William Thomson. I may say that I met the gentleman two years ago. Those were plans purchased by Secretary Whitney, who, I think, paid in the neighborhood of $25,000 for them. But since then our own American designers have planned all our ships.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will pardon me for interrupting, but I would like to know whether the plans which we bought abroad and which were used on the Texas were satisfactory. Have they not proved unsatisfactory?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; I think they have proved unsatisfactory. A great many alterations were necessary in the Texas, amounting, perhaps, to $300,000 all told. I presume that those alterations were necessitated in some degree by the defects in the plans.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My information is that they were.

Mr. FOSS. I think perhaps that was almost entirely the cause, although it may have been somewhat from other causes.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it not a fact that plans which had been rejected by the English Government were purchased by the United States?

Mr. FOSS. I do not know whether that was the fact.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it not generally conceded to have been the fact?

Mr. FOSS. I have heard a good deal to that effect.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One of these cards states that as a fact.

A MEMBER. There is no denial of it.

Mr. LESSLER. Who did the gentleman say bought those plans?

Mr. FOSS. Secretary Whitney.

There are a number of things stated on these cards which are not absolutely true. I do not wish to state that the gentleman who sent out these cards and who was responsible for these so-called facts is willfully and maliciously trying to hoodwink the American Congress. I only desire to say that the real facts are not accurately stated, and I think this House ought to know it.

Now, here is an interesting card which has been sent out: "Some nuts for the combine to crack." Now, I do not stand here representing any combine; I do not stand here representing the shipbuilders of this country. I have no affiliations with them whatever. I simply stand here to call the attention of members of this House to the actual facts. I do not care whether the ships are built in the navy-yards or whether they are built under private contract, but as a representative of the American people, realizing that it costs millions and millions of dollars to build up a navy, six and seven millions to build a battle ship, six and seven millions to build an armored cruiser, and after you have completed each, $1,000 a day to maintain it; realizing that the American Navy is a great, yes, a great, luxury, you may say, in times of peace, but an absolute and mighty necessity in times of war; realizing that we must have a navy and that it costs many millions to build it, as a representative of the American people I propose to see to it that the money that we put into the building of ships and into the maintenance of our men and officers and into the maintenance of our naval yards on the shore shall go the very farthest that a dollar will for the public interest and for the public welfare. [Applause.]

If it costs less to build ships in the navy-yards, I am for building ships in the navy-yards; if it costs less to build them under private contract, I am for that. But I am above all for the construction of our ships just where it will cost the least money and take a less number of dollars out of the pockets of the American people. Now, what about this card, "Some nuts to crack?" Let us crack a few. This is what the card says:

When the present stone dock at Mare Island Navy-Yard was completed the Government gave the contract to construct the caisson to the Union Iron Works for $78,000.

A few years later they needed a new caisson, and the job of building it was given to the Mare Island mechanics, who built it for $37,000. It is heavier and of better workmanship than the one constructed for the Government by the Union Iron Works. The Government saved on this job $41,000, or over 100 per cent. This gives you an idea of what contractor's profits are.

Last year the Bureau of Yards and Docks wanted a barge built. They advertised for bids, and the Union Iron Works bid $14,500, the Risdon Iron Works bid $30,000, the mechanics at the Mare Island Navy-Yard bid to do the work for $12,500. As the amonnt allotted for the job was but $10,000 the plans were modified and the navy-yard, on account of the showing on the other bidding, was given the job. The barge was built for less than the amount estimated.

Here is a letter from Admiral Bowles, in which he says that Admiral Endicott has furnished him with accompanying memoranda relative to the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce card, and concerning the first three paragraphs in regard to a caisson and a barge built at the Mare Island Navy-Yard:

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1902.

DEAR MR. FOSS: Admiral Endicott has furnished me with the accompanying memoranda relating to a Vallejo Chamber of Commerce card, and concerning the first three paragraphs in regard to a caisson and a barge built at the Mare Island Navy-Yard.

In regard to the statements of cost for putting the armor on the Monadnock, I can only say that the usual price is from $15 to $20 a ton, so that I can not account for the statements herein made.

Very sincerely,

F. T. BOWLES.

Hon. GEO. EDMUND FOSS.
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

Now, to read the memoranda:

MEMORANDA RELATIVE TO CRANE SCOW, NAVY-YARD, MARE ISLAND, CAL.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1902.

The construction of a crane scow for the navy-yard, Mare Island, California, was authorized by the act of June 7, 1900, and $12,000 appropriated therefor.

Under date of December 4, 1900, Civil Engineer Hollyday submitted a design for a barge, stating that the design was gotten up by the naval constructor at his request; that after it was prepared it was found that it could not be built within the appropriation; that he also secured estimates from the Union Iron Works and the Risdon Iron Works of San Francisco, both estimates being higher than the estimate of the naval constructor. The Bureau was never informed of the amount of any of the estimates. At the same time the civil engineer requested authority to construct a barge similar in design to the one shown, to cost not more than $10,000, leaving $2,000 for the installation of machinery and derrick.

Under date of December 20, 1900, the Bureau authorzed the preparation of plans for a $10,000 pontoon.

Under date of December 27, 1900, the civil engineer submitted drawings for a steel pontoon for a 40-ton derrick, stating that the naval constructor estimated the cost of the same to be $10,000 manufactured in the yard.

Under date of January 15, 1901, the Bureau approved the plans and authorized the work to be done by the yard force, the entire work, including the installation of the derrick, to come within the appropriation of $12,000.

Under date of February 19, 1902, the Bureau was informed that the scow was launched at 2.30 p. m., February 11, 1902.

The report of material and labor applied for the month of February shows that the following expenditures had been made to March 1, 1902, viz:

Materials	$3,978.06
Labor	5,163.74
Total	9,141.80

The Bureau never advertised for bids for doing this work, and never authorized the navy-yard authorities to secure estimates from any contractors.

It will be seen that the scow, as originally built, was upon a plan revised from that originally contemplated, and upon which estimates were made.

Mr. METCALF. All this shows is that the work was done for less than the amount appropriated.

Mr. FOSS. Now, about the caisson:

MEMORANDUM IN REGARD TO COST OF CAISSON FOR THE MARE ISLAND DRY DOCK.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY, BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS,
Washington, D. C., April 25, 1902.

The first was built in 1884 at a cost of $56,000. It was constructed of iron at a time when prices were very high, plates costing from 0.0235 to 0.0240 of a cent per pound, angles about 0.0240 of a cent per pound, tees 0.0275 to 0.03 of a cent, beams and channels 0.0250 of a cent.

The caisson now in use was constructed in 1897, fourteen years after the first, and of steel, when prices were much lower than in 1883, shapes of different kinds varying from about 0.02 to 0.029 of a cent per pound. This caisson cost $42,763.64.

The difference in cost between these two caissons is, therefore, $13,236.36. This is accounted for to a great degree by the decreased cost of materials and in a measure by the fact that the first caisson was built upon a new and comparatively novel design, and, according to recollection, there was not much competition upon the letting of the first.

So that you will see from the reading of these cards that here are misstatements of facts, and we have here the testimony of the chief of a great Bureau in the Navy Department as against the testimony of a man who does not put his name to the cards.

Mr. METCALF. It is not the testimony of the chief of the Bureau, but he takes the statement of the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. FOSS. Practically the same thing.

Mr. METCALF. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. METCALF. You received some 40 or 50 of these cards?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; a good many of them.

Mr. METCALF. And the only ones you desire to criticise are those to which you call the attention of the committee?

Mr. FOSS. The only ones I desire to criticise are those I call attention to.

Mr. METCALF. Nearly all these cards you have submitted to the chief constructor of the Navy?

Mr. FOSS. No, sir.

Mr. METCALF. He has reported on nearly all of them.

Mr. FOSS. No; only a few of them, upon which I consider they based their argument in favor of building ships in the navy-yards, and I submitted them to the chief constructor.

Mr. METCALF. Has not he stated in the main that the facts stated in the cards are correct, that they correctly state the facts?

Mr. FOSS. In the main?

Mr. METCALF. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. There are very few facts given in any of these cards anyway, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. METCALF. You received a card, did you not, setting forth the time in which vessels were constructed in private yards, that there was not a single ship constructed under private contract that was finished in the time?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; I received a card of that character.

Mr. METCALF. Was that card submitted to Admiral Bowles?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; I think that card was submitted to Admiral Bowles.

Mr. METCALF. Have you his answer to it? If you have, I should like to have you read it.

Mr. FOSS. That was upon the question of the time. Now, I am talking about the question of comparative cost of building in Government navy-yards and under private contract, an entirely different question.

Here is another card and Admiral Bowles's comment upon it:

SHIPBUILDING IN GOVERNMENT NAVY-YARDS.

Conceding that labor is 40 per cent higher, the Government will build cheaper than will the contractors. Look over these figures:

Senate Document No. 175, Fifty-seventh Congress, page 9, shows that the Navy Department has paid under contract for hull and machinery the sum of $45,621,730. They have paid to the contractors for changes $2,626,132, or 5.76 per cent.

One example: The contract for the building of the Virginia, 7,500 tons, was given to the Newport News Company for $3,500,000, which is at the rate of $478 per ton.

The Newport News Company built the Kentucky and the Kearsarge, 6,891 and 7,067 tons, for $317 per ton.

Figure that the profit of the Virginia, Nebraska, Georgia, New Jersey, and the Rhode Island, all sister ships, will be not less than $100 per ton. It will probably be more than that, but take that amount to estimate with.

Contract cost of these ships, 7,500 tons, at $478	$3,500,000
Profit at basis of $100 per ton	750,000
Cost of ship to the contractor	2,840,000

On ships of this class estimate that one half the contractor's cost is for material and the other half is for labor.

Contractor's cost for labor	$1,420,000
Contractor's cost for material	1,420,000
Total cost of ship for labor and material	2,840,000

Same ship if built in the navy-yards, granting that it does cost 40 per cent more for labor, the material does not cost any more, for the Government buys it as cheap as the contractor.

Contractor's cost for labor	$1,420,000
Add 40 per cent more, which, it is claimed, the Government has to pay for its labor in the navy-yards	568,000
Cost for labor in navy-yards	1,988,000
Cost of material for ship	1,420,000
Cost of ship in navy-yards	3,408,000
Cost of same ship, contract price for hull and machinery	3,500,000
Cost for changes, at 5.76 per cent	206,784
Inspection charges, estimated	20,000
Total cost of hull and machinery when built by contract	3,816,784
Cost of ship if built at the navy-yard	3,408,000
Difference in favor of the navy-yard	388,784

With all the handicap the navy-yards build the ships for less than the contractors charge the Government for the same ships.

There is also a large item of saving in the navy-yard built ship, for it costs less for repairs.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1902.

I have made a comparative statement of the cost of the Virginia built in a navy-yard and built by contract, upon the same method as shown on this, the above card, but making the profit correspond to the actual difference in cost per ton of the Virginia and Kearsarge. I have also added 10 per cent to the material cost to the Government, and 70 per cent to the contract cost of labor, instead of 40 per cent as given on the card. The 40 per cent has been taken from the statements in my testimony before the Naval Committee, that the wages at navy-yards were from 30 to 40 per cent higher than the wages at private yards. This remark applied to the day's wage, and not to the cost of labor per hour, which is quite a different matter, as is explained on page 4 of this memorandum, showing that the cost of labor per hour in a navy-yard, owing to the difference of hours of labor and paid holidays, is 70 per cent more than it is in a private yard. On page 3 of this memorandum I have made a typical comparison in the way I think it should be made, in which I have allowed the cost of labor in a navy-yard to be double the contractor's labor, which I think would be nearer the truth than 70 per cent, and this brings the excess cost of the navy-yard ship, over the contract cost to be 25.8 per cent, and it is my opinion that this is a moderate estimate under present conditions.

F. T. BOWLES,
Chief Constructor United States Navy.

Cost of the Virginia, built in a navy-yard.

The actual cost of the hull and machinery of the Kearsarge as completed was $2,441,616.49, and the actual weight of items contracted for, 6,339 tons, so that the cost per ton was $385.

The cost per ton contract weight of the Virginia is $404.55, amounting to	$3,590,000
Extras, at 5.76 per cent	206,784
Total	3,796,784
Final cost per ton	429

Assuming the difference in cost per ton to be profit, or $44 per ton instead of $100, as stated on this card:

Cost of Virginia	$3,796,784
Contractor's profit	390,456
Cost to contractor	3,406,328

Assume one-half cost to be labor and one-half material. it is my opinion that the material will cost 10 per cent more if purchased by the Government, and that under existing conditions of wages paid, hours of labor, absence of piecework, holidays, and leaves of absence with pay, I am of the opinion that the labor charges in the yards would be at least 70 per cent more.

Contractor's cost of labor plus 70 per cent	$2,895,385
Contractor's cost of material plus 10 per cent	1,773,480
Cost of Virginia built in navy-yard	4,668,865

Cost of Virginia built by contract.

Contract price	$3,590,000
Extras, at 5.76 per cent	206,784
Inspection	20,000
Total	3,816,784
Difference in favor of the contractor (equals 22 per cent of the contract cost)	852,081

Typical comparison of cost of ship built by contract and in Government navy-yards.

Labor, two-thirds of net cost	$1,600,000

Total cost to contractor	3,360,000

Mr. WHEELER. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the arguments of the chairman of the committee, and I must confess to some degree of astonishment, in view of the fact that he is the author of this report, and I think he owes it to the committee to state whether or not he is now arguing against the construction of ships in Government navy-yards, and if so, whether he proposes to oppose that provision of the bill providing for the construction of at least a part of the ships in Government navy-yards.

Mr. FOSS. I will answer my friend from Kentucky. I am here advocating the naval appropriation bill as it was reported to the House from the Naval Committee. I am in favor of every proposition in this bill.

Mr. WHEELER. Then——

Mr. FOSS. Now, hold on just a moment. I believe that that provision is wise which leaves it within the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to build ships in the navy-yards, and makes it mandatory upon him to build one ship in a navy-yard. I stand for every provision in that bill; but I think it is my duty to call the attention of the members of the House to a whole bundle of misstatements which have been sent here which they have not the time, if they had the inclination, to investigate, so that when the proposition comes before the House they will have as broad and wide and large information as any member upon the Naval Committee. In other words, I propose that the House shall be fully informed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I felt confident that the position of the gentleman was as he has stated it, and he will pardon me for saying that I think by dignifying these cards he has attracted much more attention to them than they would have otherwise received. I do not believe that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] has been misled by them, nor do I think any member of the committee or the House will be misled by them, and I do not think the gentleman is doing either himself or his committee justice in leaving the impression in the minds of some, possibly, that the controversy over the construction of ships in Government navy-yards grew out of the action of the Vallejo Commercial Club, or Chamber of Commerce, or whatever it may be.

Mr. FOSS. I only serve my purpose when I call the attention of the members of the House to the fact that these cards are not to be taken seriously. I feel that it is my duty as chairman of this committee to lay before the House all the information which I possess, in order that they may intelligently vote upon these questions, because I realize that in the multiplicity of the business which falls upon every member of the House he has not the time to study and investigate and ferret out all of these questions. I believe that he looks to the chairman of a committee and to the members of a committee standing as representatives of the great naval establishment of our country to point out any defects which may appear in publication which may have a tendency to influence the members of the House, sent here, as these have been, week in and week out. I consider that it is his bounden duty not to withhold a single bit of information that would enlighten them and upon which it is necessary for them to have some understanding in order to vote intelligently. Now, gentlemen, I will not pursue this question further. So far as these cards are concerned, I think, in view of the fact that there are so many misstatements in them, they have not done the cause of building ships in navy-yards one bit of good whatever.

Now, mind you, there has been another movement, and that is on the part of the labor unions of the country. They have sent resolutions and petitions here, and similar petitions have come also from the old soldiers to the members of this House, requesting the House to put a provision in the bill providing for the building of one or more ships in Government navy-yards. They have the sacred right of petition. I put them entirely upon a different footing than I do these gentlemen who send out these cards with a misstatement of the facts. They have made an appeal along correct lines. They have had a hearing before the Naval Committee. We have considered their case, and I do not put them in the same category as the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce, which has been sending out these cards, which, according to our naval authorities, who are the best judges, contain a perversion of facts and figures.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I stand here for every provision in this bill, including that one making it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Navy to build at least one ship in a Government navy-yard, because I think it is a good experiment to try.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. He can build them all there, can he not?

Mr. FOSS. It is within his discretion to build them all there, but he must build one. The committee so decided it. It was not my judgment, but the committee having so decided it, and standing here as the representative of the committee, I am for the provision. Let there be no question about that. [Applause.] But when I say I am for this provision I propose to tell you, for it is only just that I should tell you, why we have heretofore been opposed to building ships in Government navy-yards. In the first place, we have tried the experiment. We have built in Government navy-yards the Maine, the Texas, the Raleigh, and the Cincinnati. Two were built in the New York Navy-Yard and two in the Norfolk Navy-Yard. The vessels were begun, according to Admiral Bowles's testimony, in 1888 to 1890, and he says:

> I will compare them with the cost of vessels that were begun about the same time. We have not their exact counterparts in the service anywhere, but it is fair to compare the Maine and the Texas with the Indiana, which was begun in 1891, and was the first of the modern battle ships.
> Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Is the Indiana larger than either the Maine or the Texas?
> Mr. BOWLES. Yes; the Indiana is rated at 10,288 tons and the Texas at 6,300, while the Maine is rated at 6,000 tons. The Maine cost somewhat more than the Texas, and I am going to take the Texas and the Raleigh, which we built at Norfolk, for comparison, because I think it is a little more fair. The Texas was begun June 1, 1889, and she was commissioned in August, 1895. She was under construction, therefore, for six years. The Indiana was begun in May, 1891, and commissioned in November, 1895. She was under construction four years. The cost of the Texas for hull and machinery was $2,950,000 approximately—almost $3,000,000. The contract price for the Indiana for hull and machinery was $3,063,000. That is the comparison that you usually hear, and people will tell you that a 6,000-ton ship built in the navy-yard costs as much as a 10,000-ton battle ship built outside.

Mr. VANDIVER. May I ask the chairman a question?

Mr. FOSS. Wait until I get through with this, if you will. I do not mean to be discourteous.

Mr. VANDIVER. Certainly; neither do I.

Mr. FOSS (continuing the reading):

> Taking the cost per ton of hull and machinery, of course, the Texas runs up to $820 a ton, and in the Indiana it is $538 a ton; so that the Texas, on that basis of comparison, costs 52 per cent per ton of the hull and machinery more than the Indiana.

Mr. VANDIVER. Just at that point.

Mr. FOSS (continuing). Then he goes on and makes a statement of the total cost of shipbuilding, after putting on the armor and the armament, showing that—

> The cost of the Indiana on that basis was approximately $6,000,000, and the cost of the Texas was $4,200,000. The cost of the Texas per ton was $819, and the cost of the Indiana per ton, completed, was $609, so that the Texas cost more than the Indiana by 22.4 per cent per ton.

That was on the completed ship. Then also on the cost of the Minneapolis and the Raleigh he makes a comparison showing that on the hull and machinery alone it cost 70 per cent more to build the ship per ton in Government navy-yards than in private yards—that is, simply on the hull and machinery.

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, if the gentleman will allow me?

Mr. MAYNARD. Is it not a fact that Constructor Bowles in that testimony says that in the construction of the Texas and the Raleigh and the Maine and Cincinnati that certain materials and tools were bought that were not consumed in the construction of the ships, but were charged to the ships; and would not that increase the relative cost?

Mr. FOSS. I think they spent in the neighborhood of $125,000 to put the navy-yard in a little better shape.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. FOSS. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. The Indiana is not quite double, but over one-third larger than the Maine and the Texas?

Mr. FOSS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULL. Is there an advantage in the cost per ton of building a large ship over the cost per ton of building a small ship? In other words, take two ships, one of 10,500 tons and one of 6,500 tons; would it not cost less per ton to build the 10,500-ton ship than the 6,500 ton? I want to ask that information only.

Mr. FOSS. I do not know that I can state positively about that.

Mr. VANDIVER. Now, will the chairman yield to me for a question? I could not quite distinctly hear all that he was reading. Was the report that you were reading from a part of the hearing of Constructor Bowles?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. VANDIVER. At what time?

Mr. FOSS. This was in our hearings of the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. VANDIVER. A further question: Did not Constructor Bowles in that same hearing also explain why it was that a ship constructed in the navy-yard costs more than a ship constructed in the private yards, and did he not give it as his opinion at that time that the Government ought to build ships in the navy-yards?

Mr. FOSS. Admiral Bowles at that time thought the Government ought to build some ships in the navy-yards.

Mr. VANDIVER. That is the fact, and I think it ought to be brought out.

Mr. FOSS. It is true that the naval constructors are generally in favor of building ships in the navy-yards. It is their profession, it is their business, just as lawyers are in favor of trying cases, just as doctors desire patients, just as one professional or another is ambitious and is desirous to pursue his calling. I believe that universally the naval constructors are in favor of building ships, although Admiral Bowles said this. His latest testimony upon this point is that it will cost the Government 25 per cent more to build ships in Government navy-yards than under private contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the agreement reached just prior to the House going into Committee of the Whole that to-day should be devoted to general debate, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Louisiana, and under that arrangement, assuming that the committee will rise at 5 o'clock, the gentleman from Illinois has used one half of the time.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I am content to concede all the time that my colleague requires to conclude his remarks.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. FOSS. Very well.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I have great respect for the gentleman from Illinois, and would like to know whether it is his opinion that it is to the advantage of the Government in letting its contracts for new ships to have yards in which may be constructed vessels independently of private contract.

Mr. FOSS. I think it is well for the Government to have a few yards where, in case of necessity—in case of war—they could construct ships. But I think it would be a very extravagant policy to fit up all the navy-yards for the construction of ships.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. May we not get better figures in private contracts by reason of the fact that we are competent and prepared to build ships ourselves?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; probably so.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I think it ought to in a matter of so great importance.

Mr. FOSS. Now, the reasons urged by those who contend that the Government can not build ships in the navy-yards cheaper than in private yards are these: First, I have shown by our experience that we have not been able to do it in the past. But gentlemen make the argument on the other side that the navy-yards were not in as good condition then as at the present time, and I concede to them that fact. If gentlemen will only stop to consider this question for a moment, they will see for themselves why it is that the navy-yards can not build ships as cheaply as they can be built under private contract. Take, for instance, the hours of labor. They work eight hours only in the navy-yards and nine and ten hours in the private yards. There is a difference of 20 per cent in the hours of labor.

Now, there is a difference in the amount of wages. Admiral Bowles says in his testimony, and it stands here uncontradicted, that we pay the laboring men in the navy-yards 30 or 40 per cent more than in private yards.

Mr. METCALF. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that under the rules of the Navy Department they are to pay in navy-yards of the country exactly the same wages as are paid in the same trades in the immediate vicinity, and is not that a rule rigidly enforced? I know it is as far as my part of the country is concerned, and that they are often paid less than they are paid in other branches in the same vicinity.

Mr. FOSS. Well, that is the statement of Admiral Bowles in his testimony before the committee, and the gentleman can read it for himself.

Mr. METCALF. I call the gentleman's attention to the rule of the Department.

Mr. FOSS. I will yield to my colleague Mr. WATSON, who sits here, to read the testimony of Admiral Bowles.

Mr. WATSON. The Chairman asked the question of Admiral Bowles: How much more are the men getting in the navy-yards than in private yards? Admiral Bowles answered:

> Comparing the wages of the navy-yard in Brooklyn and New York with the shipbuilding concerns of the Delaware, I imagine they are getting 35 to 40 per cent more.
> The CHAIRMAN. More wages?
> Admiral BOWLES. Yes.

That is a fact, and I know of no ruling in the Navy Department to the contrary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the wages paid in the Brooklyn Navy-Yard are the average wages paid to a mechanic in the same branches in the immediate vicinity, and that is the course pursued throughout the country.

Mr. FOSS. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word further. I do not care to be interrupted, as I would like to finish my remarks this afternoon, so that the other side can go on. I have pointed out as one reason the difference in the hours of labor, eight to ten, and I have pointed out another reason for the difference in the cost, and that is 30 to 40 per cent more wages paid in the navy-yards than in the private yards. Now, I will point out another reason, and that is in private yards I think you will find they work by the piece and in the Government yards they work by the day.

Then there is another reason why they can not build as cheaply in the Government yards, and that is, we give our employees in the navy-yards every holiday and pay them for it. Not only that, but we give them two weeks' leave of absence and pay them for that. There is another reason which enters into it, and that is, the Government can not buy material as cheaply as a private contractor. It can not go into the open market and buy material. It has no large sum of money by which it can take advantage of the market rates and provide for the future when materials are low in price. It has to buy from time to time, and has usually paid pretty good rates for everything it wanted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman believe that private yards set aside large sums to buy material when material is low?

Mr. FOSS. They always have ready capital to do it with, and the Congress of the United States does not appropriate any more money for a department than it is obliged to. It never has any ready capital.

Mr. WHEELER. As bearing somewhat on this question, I wish to ask the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] to the following provision, in lines 7 to 11, on page 73 of the bill:

> The contract for the construction of each of said vessels so contracted for shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery, and not more than two of said battle ships and armored cruisers and not more than one of said gunboats herein provided for shall be built by one contracting party.

Is that a usual provision in bills of this character?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; I think the usual provision.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman will remember that this particular language was not submitted to the committee; it was submitted to the gentleman from Ohio to lick into shape. I have therefore asked whether that provision is usual.

Mr. FOSS. That, I think, is the usual provision. I think the gentleman will find it substantially in every naval appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out some of the reasons why, in my judgment, the Government yards can not build ships as cheaply as the private yards. I will rehearse those reasons:

First, the difference in the hours of labor; second, the difference in wages; third, the loss of time in Government yards by holidays and by leaves of absence; fourth, impossibility of the Government buying material as cheaply as the private contractors; fifth, much of the work in the private yards is piecework, while in the Government yards work is done by the day.

But there are some other considerations that enter into this question. Suppose that the Government builds a ship as cheaply as the private contractor; but suppose that ship does not come up to the requirements as to speed, what are you going to do about it? The Government has built the ship, has paid for its construction, but there is no guaranty that the vessel shall be equal to the requirements of the Government. Where a ship is built under contract, there is an absolute guaranty on the part of the contractor, and if the ship does not fulfill the stipulations of the contract the Government says: "Away with your ship!" That is an important item to be taken into consideration.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. On that point let me ask the gentleman this question: Has the Government within the last ten years ever refused to accept any ship from any private contractor because it did not come up to the contract, either in speed or otherwise?

Mr. FOSS. I do not know that such has been the fact. But I think the Government has called upon the contractor to make good his contract or has insisted upon deductions from the contract price in case of any failure to conform to the requirements of the contract.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And has not Congress universally remitted such penalties?

Mr. COOMBS. As to cases where the Government has made deductions from the contract price because the contractor has failed to complete the vessel in accordance with the contract, is there not in this bill a provision for a refund in such cases of the money withheld by the Government?

Mr. FOSS. No. I would be glad if the gentleman would point out any such provision.

Mr. COOMBS. I thought there was such a provision. I presume I am mistaken.

Mr. RIXEY. Is it not the fact that the contractors for the torpedo-boat destroyers now claim that they have lost money upon that contract and have applied to the Navy Department to bear a portion of that loss, and has not the Navy Department recommended to Congress that the Government bear one-half the loss?

Mr. FOSS. I think that is true; but that matter has never been considered yet by our committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a few words, in conclusion, in reference to this subject. I may say here, if gentlemen will not regard it as too personal to myself, that I made some study, not only in this country but abroad, of the building of ships in private yards and in Government yards. Some two years ago I visited all the great private yards of England and some of the other countries, and I visited also the Government navy-yards. I looked very carefully into the question of the comparative cost of building ships in Government yards and in private yards.

Up to 1896 there was no question that in England it cost more to build ships in Government yards than in private yards. From 1896 down, by reason of the fact that they have been perfecting their navy-yards, they have got to the point where the cost is about the same. Sometimes they will build a battle ship in a private yard which will cost more than a similar ship built in a government yard, and sometimes the reverse will happen.

But mark you the difference in conditions between foreign yards and our yards. In England the hours of labor in Government yards are the same as in private yards. Here the difference in hours of labor is as 8 to 10. The wages are about the same. In England the conditions of labor in Government yards and in private yards are practically on the same footing.

That is the experience, too, I think, in France and also, I was about to say, in Germany. No, not in Germany. The information which I obtained on this subject when in Germany has been confirmed recently by the German secretary of the navy or minister of marine, with whom, when he was here a few months ago, I discussed this question. The experience in Germany to-day as to the comparative cost of building ships in private yards and in Government yards is that it costs from 10 per cent to 25 per cent more to build ships in Government yards than to construct them under private contract. And the other day when I made inquiry on this subject from one of the naval authorities of Russia, I was told that practically the same thing existed in that country.

And, mark you, in Germany they pay less to their men in Government yards than in private yards; and so they do in Russia; whereas in our own country the Government yards pay 30 or 40 per cent more. Besides, we give them leaves of absence, and give them two hours each day additional. Do you mean to say that if in foreign countries they can not build them as cheaply as under private contract when conditions are equal, we in our own country, where the conditions are unequal, can build them as cheaply as under private contract?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment. Why do they build and continue to build them in Government yards?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, that is a question of policy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not the reason because it gives competition all the time, if they have the private yard and the Government yard?

Mr. FOSS. It may be that. It may be that their systems of government over there are more paternal than ours. It may be that here in this country we give scope to individual inventive genius, whereas over there it may be perchance their purpose to stifle it. Here we exalt the individual; there, the state. It may lie in the very foundation and construction of government, but I want to say to you, gentlemen, I have gone into a very careful consideration of the whole question, and I thought I ought in duty to you to present it carefully before you, so that you may get the result of what study and investigation a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs has made.

I want to say to you, however, that I do not believe we will be able to settle this question notwithstanding our past experience, although we have before us the light which comes from foreign countries, although we have all of the facts which may come from research and from study, I say I do not believe that we can settle this question which now vexes many minds unless we try the experiment of building at least one ship in a Government navy-yard. I may say that the Government navy-yards have plenty of employment for their labor to-day. The repair work which comes from the ships is enough to keep the men employed, and as we build up our Navy of course there will be more repair work to do. If you build a ship in a Government navy-yard, it will mean that you will have to take on perhaps a thousand or two thousand more men to build that ship, and after they become nicely settled in their homes—Vallejo, or in some other city dependent on Government work—then they will come and insist that you keep up the building of ships. Why? Because you attracted them there with the promise of Government work, and you can not go back on them then.

Now, there are all these questions to be taken into consideration; but I say to you, let us try the experiment. Let us settle the question so, notwithstanding the fact that I have presented a side of this question which may seem to be antagonistic to the proposition contended for in the bill, I felt that possibly nobody would say anything upon it unless I did, and I thought it was due to every member of the House to know both sides, because only after they knew both sides could they intelligently vote for it. But let no member of this committee or House think for one single moment that I do not stand here advocating the provision, because I think it is a wise provision to build at least one ship in a Government navy-yard, not only to solve for the country the question as to whether or not we have been paying exorbitant prices for our ships, but also to get some definite data before the country as to the relative cost of building them as a guidance for the future policy of the construction of the American Navy.

Gentlemen, I thank you for having listened to me as long as you have. I feel very much interested in this subject of building up the American Navy. I believe it is a wise policy. We must have a navy that is strong enough to maintain the honor of our country whenever and wherever that honor is assailed; we must have a navy strong enough to preserve our commerce and our merchant marine; we must have a navy strong enough also to stand back of the foreign policy of our Government and see to it that American rights are forever protected everywhere under the blue canopy of the sky. Because I am for the Navy, because I am for the construction of these mighty battle ships, because I am for all these things, it is my purpose and ambition to see to it that while they cost so much money, while they take out of the pockets of the people millions and millions of dollars, that it shall not ever be said or charged against the Naval Committee on the floor of the American Congress or anywhere else that one single dollar was ever extravagantly appropriated or did not go as far as it was possible to send it, but that in all our appropriations for the maintenance of this mighty naval establishment we have been economical, we have been wise, we have been judicious, and we have always had before our eyes the interests of the American people and of the American Republic. [Prolonged applause.]

APPENDIX.

[House Report No. 1792, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's annual message as relates to the naval establishment, together with the annual estimates of the Navy Department, submit herewith a bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, with the following statement:

The amount carried by this bill is $77,659,386.63.

Total estimates of the Department amounted to $98,910,984.63, to which were added supplemental estimates to the amount of $1,153,700 and additional estimates to the amount of $5,000,000. The committee, after the most careful investigation of all of these estimates, having in view a careful and judicious expenditure of public money without in any way injuring the efficiency of the naval service, made deductions to the amount of $27,405,298. This bill, as above stated, carries $77,659,386.63, which is a decrease of appropriations over the naval appropriation act of last year of $442,404.37.

The following table gives a comparative statement of the estimates of this year, the amounts appropriated last year, and the amounts embodied in this bill for the several bureaus and departments of the naval establishment:

Pay of the Navy in this bill is $16,138,199, which is made up from the following table:

Pay of 2,014 officers on the active list	$4,667,166
Commutation of quarters for officers	200,000

To pay interest on deposits by enlisted men, act February 9, 1899	16,000
Total	16,138,199

This is an increase of $937,915 over the appropriation for the same object last year, and is accounted for by the increased number of officers on the active list and the 3,000 additional men recommended by the committee for properly manning the new ships of the Navy.

Under "Pay, miscellaneous," the appropriation proposed in this bill is the same as that in the law of last year, but the emergency fund has been reduced to $100,000.

There is a proviso attached to the emergency fund which will permit civilian employees performing duty at insular naval stations to be paid out of this fund until Congress shall make specific appropriation for them.

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

This Bureau has general jurisdiction over the officers and men of the Navy, their training and assignment; also the movement of vessels in the Navy and their complement of officers and men. It has charge of the compilation of the Naval Register and preparation, revision, and enforcement of all tactics, drill books, signal codes, cipher codes, and the uniform regulations. It also has general supervision of the Naval Academy and technical school for officers (except the War College and torpedo school).

The following is a statement of the estimates of the Bureau for the fiscal year 1903, with the appropriations carried by this bill and the appropriations for the current fiscal year:

Bureau of Navigation.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill, 1903.	Appropriated, 1902.
Transporting, recruiting, and contingent	$275,000.00	$275,000.00	$180,000.00
Gunnery exercises	12,000.00	12,000.00	12,000.00
Outfits for naval apprentices	117,000.00	117,000.00	117,000.00
Outfits for landsmen	225,000.00	225,000.00	225,000.00
Outfits on first enlistment	135,000.00	135,000.00	----------
Maintenance of colliers (under equipment last year)	350,000.00	350,000.00	350,000.00
Naval training station, California	30,000.00	30,000.00	30,000.00
Naval training station, Rhode Island	56,600.00	55,000.00	45,000.00
Naval training station, Port Royal S. C	45,000.00	----------	----------
Naval War College, Rhode Island	14,246.25	14,246.25	11,200.00
Naval Home, Philadelphia	76,425.00	76,425.00	76,425.00
Total	1,336,271.25	1,289,671.25	1,046,625.00

As will be seen from the above table there is an increase in appropriations over that of last year amounting to $243,046.25. This is made up in two ways. First, by the increase in the appropriation for transportation and recruiting of men in consequence of the increase in the personnel, and, secondly, by the recommendation of the committee of an appropriation of $135,000 for outfits for men on their first enlistment. It is believed by your committee that the expenditure of this amount will bring into the Navy a better class of men and at the same time insure fewer desertions.

There is a provision made in the bill for the appointment of a board of naval officers by the Secretary of the Navy to recommend a suitable site for a naval training station at some point on the Great Lakes, and having recommended such a site to estimate its value and ascertain the cost of its purchase and make a full and detailed report to Congress.

It is believed that the establishment of a naval training station on the lakes will have the effect of drawing into our Navy a great many strong and sturdy young men from the fields and farms of the Middle West who will make excellent seamen. It has frequently been said that our best men of to-day come from the interior, and more from that section of the country than all other sections combined.

BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

This Bureau has general charge of the ordnance of the Navy and the armor and armament of vessels, the torpedo station and magazines on shore, and designs the interior arrangements of all buildings erected for its use at navy-yards, as well as the machinery used for handling ammunition on ship, the interior of the turrets and the arrangement of guns, and the distribution of armor thereon. All torpedoes, powder, guns, and war explosives of all kinds, and armor plate, are bought and manufactured under its supervision. It has control of all details of its own administration.

The following table gives the estimates for the next fiscal year and the amount carried by this bill and the amount appropriated last year:

Bureau of Ordnance.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill, 1903.	Appropriated, 1902.
Ordnance and ordnance stores	$800,000.00	$800,000.00	$500,000.00

It will be seen from the above table that there is an increase in the amount of appropriations for this Bureau over that of last year of $525,551. This is due to an increase in the appropriation for ordnance and ordnance stores and for target practice of $300,000 over that of the previous year. Last year the appropriation was not enough, and consequently the Department has had to ask for a deficiency appropriation of $300,000 to carry on the work of the Bureau. The importance of target practice can not be overestimated. We may have ships and we may have men, but if the men are not trained by constant target practice to use the guns on our ships, then, in the stress of war, we will, when perchance too late, realize our weakness. The one thing which so marked the superiority of our men over that of the Spaniards in the recent war was their gunnery. Admiral O'Neil estimates that the total cost of target practice for all vessels of the Navy per annum is nearly $900,000, or, allowing for a certain number of vessels out of commission, approximately $750,000, and yet the amount allowed is not nearly as great as that allowed in some of the foreign navies.

The next important item in this Bureau, showing an increase over that of last year, is an appropriation of $175,000 for a new and improved battery for the Newark, a cruiser built in 1890, which has an antiquated battery and one by no means equal in efficiency to the later types. It is recommended that she be given a new battery, and also an appropriation of $200,000 is recommended for new and improved batteries on the New Orleans and the Albany, two vessels built in England for Brazil, but purchased at the outbreak of the Spanish war by the United States. The batteries on these vessels differ from those used on our own, requiring special ammunition, and it is a source of great inconvenience to keep them supplied. It is believed by the Department that they should carry the standard United States Navy guns.

The next new and important item in this Bureau is that of $250,000 for the purchase and manufacture of reserve guns for the ships of the Navy. It is believed that we should have a number of guns constantly in reserve in case of accident to replace those which will have to be repaired from time to time. The other items under this Bureau—the reserve supply of ammunition and purchase of smokeless powder and reserve guns for auxiliary cruisers, maintenance of the torpedo stations, the arming and equipping of the Naval Militia, repairs, miscellaneous, and civil establishment—are the same in the amount of appropriation as those of last year.

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT.

The duties of this Bureau consist in furnishing the coal and general equipment of vessels. It also has charge of the manufacture of rope, anchors, cables, rigging, sails, galleys, and cooking utensils, and a portion of the electrical machinery for ships; also of the Naval Observatory, Nautical Almanac, and compass offices, and all details of its own administration.

The following table shows the estimates, the amount of appropriation proposed in the bill, and amount carried by the last appropriation act:

Bureau of Equipment.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill, 1903.	Appropriated, 1902.
Coal and transportation	$2,500,000.00	$2,500,000.00	$2,000,000.00
Equipment of vessels	2,000,000.00	2,000,000.00	1,500,000.00
Ocean and lake surveys	100,000.00	100,000.00	100,000.00
Depots for coal	----------	640,000.00	750,000.00
Maintenance for colliers, 1903, under navigation	350,000.00	----------	350,000.00
Contingent	35,000.00	35,000.00	35,000.00
Civil establishment	33,002.52	31,202.52	29,802.52
Total	5,018,002.52	5,306,202.52	4,764,802.52

It will be seen from the above that there is an increase of $541,400 over that provided for last year. The increase in the appropriation recommended this year under this Bureau is due practically to two items, the first being that for coal and transportation of $2,500,000, which is an increase over that of last year of $500,000. In the urgent deficiency bill of this year an appropriation of $800,000 was asked for in order to provide fully for our ships. During the last fiscal year the Bureau of Equipment purchased 324,108 tons of coal, costing $2,273,111.81.

There is an increase in the next item of equipment of vessels of $500,000, due to the necessities of an enlarged Navy. A deficiency of $450,000 in the bill was asked for this year in addition to that of $1,500,000 appropriated last year. It will be seen that the item for coal depots has been reduced $110,000. The other items under this Bureau are practically the same as last year.

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

This is the civil engineering bureau of the Department, and has charge of the construction of buildings and their maintenance in the several navy-yards, also of all docks and shore structures of all kinds, such as quay walls, wharfs, etc., for which it estimates. It also has charge of all topographical improvements in such yards: Newport, R. I., Annapolis, Md., and the Naval Home, Philadelphia, the magazines and hospitals outside of navy-yards and the buildings for which it does not estimate being excepted from its jurisdiction. The part of the naval appropriation bill under public works is estimated for by this Bureau.

The following table shows the estimates for the fiscal year 1903, the proposed appropriation in this bill, and the amount carried by the last appropriation act:

Bureau of Yards and Docks.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.
Maintenance of yards and docks	$800,000.00	$800,000.00	$500,000.00
Contingent	50,000.00	40,000.00	50,000.00
Civil establishment	134,204.08	102,214.08	104,879.08
Total	784,204.08	742,214.08	654,879.08

As will be seen, there is an increase of $90,000 in this Bureau over the act of last year. Practically all of this is due to the necessity for increased number of employees in consequence of the action of Congress in giving two weeks' leave of absence to employees in the navy-yards. The item for contingent expenses has been reduced $10,000.

PUBLIC WORKS.

The following table shows the estimates for 1903, the amounts carried by this bill, and those appropriated for the present fiscal year:

Bureau of Yards and Docks.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.

Guam	12,300
Plans		30,000
Total	20,781,375	6,561,075	6,775,010

The estimates call for the sum of $20,781,375. Your committee after most careful investigation of the above items reduced them $14,220,300, leaving $6,561,075, which it recommends for public improvements in our yards and stations during the present year. Heretofore Congress has authorized the construction of many new buildings at our different stations, and it is thought advisable this year to complete these first before entering upon new constructions, and this is the policy which has been carried into effect except in a few yards, notably that of Algiers, which is a new naval station and requires the building of some shops, and also at Puget Sound, which is also comparatively a new station and is growing rapidly in importance. The estimates were sent in by the Department for a naval station at San Juan, P. R., to the amount of $2,613,000, but the committee thought it would be wise not to provide for any naval station in the West Indies until they had more definite knowledge as to the best location for one.

Estimates for a naval station at Olongapo, P. I., to the amount of $1,443,000, were also cut out for practically the same reason. It is believed for the present we can get along with the old Spanish naval station at Cavite, and accordingly the committee has made some recommendations for that station, notably $200,000, toward the purchase of a steel floating dock, which can be used there or wherever it may hereafter be deemed advisable to build a navy-yard. Estimates for housing and storing torpedo vessels at Boston, to cost $350,000; at New York, to cost the same; at Charleston, S. C., the same; at Pensacola, to cost $650,000; at Mare Island, to cost $125,000, and other items, such as the purchase of land at New York, $2,000,000; at Norfolk, $350,000; barracks for enlisted men, to cost, in all, at New York, $500,000; at League Island, $350,000; at Mare Island, $350,000; and storehouses to be established at the different navy-yards, costing anywhere from $150,000 to $800,000, were all of them considered by the committee as matters which might be delayed for further consideration without in any way injuring the efficiency of the naval service.

Under this Bureau the committee recommends an appropriation of $1,050,000 for the completion of the four dry docks at Portsmouth, Boston, League Island, and Mare Island, which are now in process of construction.

It may be of interest to members of the House to know the value of the real estate, chattels, and machinery plants at the various yards and stations, and accordingly the following table is inserted:

PUBLIC WORKS (BUREAU OF NAVIGATION).

The following table gives the estimates for 1903, the amount carried by the bill, and the amount appropriated last year:

Public works, Bureau of Navigation.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

By act of Congress June 7, 1900, the Secretary of the Navy was authorized to complete plans "covering all contemplated buildings and improvements at the Naval Academy and for each and every purpose connected therewith, which plans shall involve the total expenditure of not more than $8,000,000." And it was further provided—

"That after the preparation and approval of the plans * * * the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to enter into a contract or contracts for any part or all of the improvements and buildings herein authorized within said limit of cost, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law."

Accordingly such plans were completed and approved by the Secretary of the Navy on October 8, 1900, and contracts have been let for most of the buildings.

The armory and the boathouse are nearly finished; the contract has been let for cadets' quarters, which will cost $2,248,000, accommodating 1,200 cadets; the foundations of the marine engineering building are now being constructed; the gymnasium and officers' quarters will be under contract by June 1, as will also be the building known as the officers' mess, and plans for the sea-wall work are now practically completed and will be advertised in a short time.

The following is a statement of the appropriations which have been made for the rebuilding of the Naval Academy:

By act of May 4, 1898	$500,000
By act of March 3, 1899	720,000
By act of June 7, 1900	350,000
By act of March 3, 1901	3,000,000
Total appropriated	4,570,000

There has been expended up to date $1,192,148.11. The payments to be made between now and the 1st of July will bring the expenditures up to $2,094,934.37, leaving on July 1 an unexpended balance of $2,500,000. This unexpended balance, with a further appropriation of $500,000 recommended in this bill, will be necessary to meet the payments due on contracts made and to be made during the coming fiscal year.

There is further provided under the head of "Public works, Bureau of Navigation," improvements and buildings for the naval training station in California, $31,500, and also some improvements at the training station, Rhode Island, costing $114,280. Annex to the present building at the Naval War College in Rhode Island to cost $60,000 has been recommended by the general board as necessary for the performance of the important work of the college where war plans and schemes of campaign and the study of the art of war in its broadest and highest sense are carried on.

PUBLIC WORKS, BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

The following table shows the estimates of this year, the amount carried by the bill, and the amount appropriated last year:

Public works, Bureau of Ordnance.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill, 1903.	Appropriated, 1902.
Naval magazine, Iona Island	$49,500	$49,500	$100,000
Naval magazine, Dover	93,800	80,000	65,000
Naval magazine, Fort Mifflin	5,000	5,000	56,000
Naval magazine, Norfolk	117,500	46,500	60,500
Naval torpedo station, Newport	32,000	28,000	25,000
Naval proving ground, Indian Head	27,000	23,000	11,600
Naval magazine, Portsmouth	400,000

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill, 1903.	Appropriated, 1902.
Naval magazine, Boston	$500,000
Naval shell house, Chelsea	8,000
Naval quarters, Rose Island	5,200	$5,200
Naval magazine, Fort Lafayette	35,000	25,000
Water system, Fort Norfolk	2,000
St. Helena, Norfolk	2,300
Naval magazine, Man Island	80,000	80,000
Naval magazine, Puget Sound	100,000	50,000
Total	1,457,300	392,200	$318,100

It will be seen that there is a slight increase over that appropriated last year of $74,100. Some improvements are asked for at the different magazines, as shown in the above table. Among the estimates were recommendations from the Department for a naval magazine at Portsmouth approximately to cost $400,000, and Boston $500,000; but in view of the fact that these two navy-yards are within short distances of each other, about 40 miles apart, it is thought that possibly one magazine might answer for both, and accordingly the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board of naval officers to recommend a site or sites for one naval magazine on the New England coast and to make report to Congress at its next session is placed in this bill.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

The appropriation for the maintenance of the grounds and roads of the Naval Observatory which heretofore has been $10,000 per year is reduced to one-half the amount, $5,000.

BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

The duties of this Bureau are implied in its title, and comprise all that relates to the laboratories, naval hospitals, and dispensaries. It designs various buildings erected within the navy-yards for its own purposes, so far as their internal arrangements are concerned, and has control of the same after completion. It designs, builds, and maintains all buildings erected for its own purposes outside of navy-yards, and, generally, estimates for and controls all the details of its own organization.

The following table shows the estimates of 1903, the amount carried by the bill, and the amount appropriated last year:

Bureau of Medicine and Surgery.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.
Medical department	$100,000	$125,000	$95,000
Naval hospital fund	40,000	40,000	40,000
Contingent	35,000	35,000	35,000
Repairs	20,000	30,000	20,000
Naval hospital, Rhode Island			20,000
Naval hospital, Canacao	50,000	50,000
Total	245,000	280,000	210,000

It will be seen that there is an increase of $70,000 in the above table, $30,000 of which is due to increased necessity for supplies for our officers and men and at our navy-yards and stations. There is recommended an appropriation of $50,000 for a naval hospital at Canacao, P. I., which is strongly urged by the Bureau.

BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS.

Generally speaking, this is the financial bureau of the Department. Its duties comprise all that relates to requiring for or preparing provisions, clothing, small stores, and contingent stores of the Pay Department; the purchase of all supplies for the naval establishment, except medical and surgical appliances, and instruments and supplies for the Marine Corps, and the keeping of a proper system of accounts of the same. Like the other bureaus, it estimates for and controls its own administration.

The following statement shows the estimates, the amount carried by this bill, and the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year:

Supplies and accounts.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.
Provisions, Navy	$4,000,000.00	$3,500,000.00	$3,250,000.00
Contingent	250,000.00	200,000.00	200,000.00
Civil establishment	117,590.00	103,932.28	93,849.28
Total	4,367,590.00	3,803,932.28	3,543,849.28

It will be seen from the above table that the increased appropriations recommended this year over that made last year are $260,083. The item of provisions for the Navy is increased from $3,250,000 to $3,500,000. This is due to the fact that under this bill we are providing for 3,000 additional men, and it will be necessary to provide for their necessities. The item for contingent is the same as that of last year, but there is a small increase of approximately $10,000 under the civil establishment for the navy-yard at Puget Sound and the naval station at Key West.

NAVY RATION.

Under this Bureau is inserted an amendment to section 1580 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so as to provide for a new navy ration. The Secretary of the Navy ordered a board to investigate the whole subject and make report, which has been done in a separate communication referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The present ration has been substantially without change since it was established in July, 1861. The Secretary, in his report, says:

"The board recommends the legislation that will give to the crews of our ships a liberal and proper amount under any and all conditions of service without compelling them to contribute to their own subsistence, as at present. The changes recommended are approved and would make the cost of the ration about 30 cents per man per diem, which is now its nominal commutation value. At present the actual cost of the ration is from 21 to 22 cents."

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

The duties of this Bureau comprise all that relate to the designing, building, fitting, and repairing the hulls of ships, their turrets, spars, capstans, windlasses, steering gear, and ventilating apparatus, and, in conjunction with the Bureau of Ordnance, designing the construction of ammunition hoists, their shafts, machinery, and appurtenances; placing and securing armor; placing and securing on board ship the armament and its accessories as manufactured and supplied by the Bureau of Ordnance. It has charge of the care and preservation of ships in reserve, the docking of ships, the designing of slips, and the internal arrangement of the various buildings and shops under its control, and estimates for and controls its own administration.

The following table shows the estimates for 1903, the amount carried by this bill, and the amount appropriated for 1902:

Construction and repair.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.
Construction and repair of vessels	$9,000,000.00	$8,000,000.00	$7,000,000.00
Improvements, construction plants:
Portsmouth	30,000.00	30,000.00	50,000.00
Boston	50,000.00	50,000.00	50,000.00
New York	50,000.00	50,000.00	25,000.00
League Island	50,000.00	50,000.00	50,000.00
Norfolk	50,000.00	50,000.00	50,000.00
Pensacola			15,000.00
Mare Island	50,000.00	50,000.00	50,000.00
Puget Sound	75,000.00	75,000.00	30,000.00
New Orleans	15,000.00	15,000.00	15,000.00
Charleston	50,000.00
Philippines	50,000.00	50,000.00
Derrick, New York	35,000.00
Derrick, Cavite	45,000.00
Lighters, Mare Island	70,000.00
Four steel tugs	280,000.00	140,000.00
Civil establishment	25,824.25	25,824.25	25,824.25
Total	9,925,824.25	8,585,824.25	7,360,824.25

It will be seen from the above table that there is an increase under this Bureau of $1,225,000, which is largely made up from the necessity for the increase in the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the repair of our vessels, which are increasing in number each year. A new item was inserted for $50,000 for a construction plant at Cavite, P. I., and also an appropriation of $140,000 for two steel tugs, necessary for the general service of the navy-yards at home stations. The items under the civil establishment of the Bureau are practically the same as those of last year.

BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

The duties of this Bureau comprise all that relates to designing, building, fitting out, and repairing the machinery for which steam is the motive power on board ship. Like the other bureaus, it designs the internal arrangement of its various shops at the navy-yard and estimates for and controls its own administration.

The following table shows the estimates for the fiscal year 1903, the amount carried by this bill, and the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year:

Steam engineering.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.
Steam machinery	$3,450,000	$3,405,000	$3,245,000
Contingent	1,000	1,000	1,000
Machine plant:
Portsmouth	100,000
League Island	130,000	130,000	100,000
Norfolk	25,000	25,000
Mare Island	80,000	80,000	100,000
Puget Sound	125,000	125,000
Building experimental station	400,000	200,000
Civil establishment	23,000	17,900	16,900
Total	4,289,000	3,963,900	3,462,900

The above table shows an increase of appropriations to the amount of $521,000. As will be seen, there is an increase of $150,000 in the first item under this Bureau for the completion, repairing, and preservation of machinery and boilers of vessels, etc. There is also an appropriation for the equipment of the new steam engineering shops at League Island, Mare Island, and Puget Sound. An experimental station and testing laboratory for the Bureau of Steam Engineering has been strongly recommended by the Department and the Secretary of the Navy, and after carefully considering the same the committee has inserted an appropriation in this bill for its establishment.

The appropriation of the civil establishment of the Bureau of Steam Engineering is increased only by $1,000 over that of last year.

NAVAL ACADEMY (CIVIL ESTABLISHMENT).

The following table shows the estimates for 1903, the amount carried by the bill, and the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1902:

Naval Academy.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.
Pay of professors and others	$68,991.00	$55,191.00	$55,191.00
Pay of watchmen, mechanics, and others	46,259.95	46,259.95	44,799.95
Pay of steam employees	11,154.82	11,154.82	7,824.50
Catboats	4,500.00	4,500.00	4,500.00
Repairs	31,000.00	31,000.00	51,000.00
Heating and lighting	20,000.00	20,000.00	20,000.00
Contingent	61,800.00	61,800.00	43,800.00
Total	243,705.77	229,905.77	227,115.45

The amounts of these appropriations are practically the same as those of last year, in some cases there being reductions and in others increases; but the totals are about the same. Under this Bureau an insertion is made for the appointment of 500 additional cadets.

MORE OFFICERS.

Of course everyone must realize that we can not go on building up the matériel of the Navy without at the same time increasing the personnel. If we build ships, we must also provide for officers and men to man them. The former are absolutely useless without the latter. The Secretary in his report calls special attention to the need of more line officers, and the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation in his report, in which he considers the subject exhaustively, says:

"The ever-increasing need of line officers has made itself felt with augmented force during the past fiscal year. At no time in the history of the Navy has such a condition held as now exists. If the Department were suddenly called upon to man for war service all the vessels available in the navy-yards, it would be confronted with a requirement impossible to meet. It is a fact that there are not enough line officers of the Navy to man the vessels already constructed. This being the case, the Bureau need scarcely call attention to the state of affairs which will exist in about three years when the vessels now under construction will be completed. In order to make plain the need for officers, the subject must be approached in a logical manner, and to do this we must consider the needs of each ship constructed and under construction.

"Taking then the sum of the needs of the individual ships, we reach the needs of the service, considering incidentally the need for a reserve, and other reasons which will prevent the total number of officers on the list from actually serving on board ship in time of war. To this end the following is submitted:

Line officers required to man a battle ship.

1 commanding officer.
1 executive officer.
1 chief engineer.
1 navigating officer.
6 turret officers.
2 secondary battery officers.
3 powder division officers.
2 assistants to chief engineer.

17 in all.

"In order to make plain that the above table is the lowest possible estimate of officers actually needed on board battle ships, there is furnished the following table showing the number of officers actually placed on board ships of similar displacement by foreign powers:

Nation and ship.	Number of line officers.	Remarks.
England, Barfleur	33	Includes midshipmen.
France, Bouvet	26	Do.
Germany, Kaiser Friederich III	30	In addition to this there are a number of midshipmen not given here.

"It will be seen at a glance in comparing the above table with the first table that the Bureau's estimate, which includes cadets, is at least 30 per cent smaller than actual conditions now existing in other navies.

"In preparing the following tables the Bureau has estimated for the smaller vessels by assigning to them complements of officers such as are actually carried by vessels now in service and of equal displacement. Without going into details it will be readily seen that the Bureau's estimates in these cases are also a minimum. The following tables show the number of officers which would be required on July 1, 1904, to man the ships of the Navy then actually completed, Table A showing the officers needed for vessels which have been commissioned, but which are now out of commission for repairs or in reserve; Table B showing the officers needed for vessels now under construction, but which will be completed by July 1, 1904:

"Attention is invited to the fact that the above estimates do not include officers to man auxiliary vessels which must be used in time of war, such as scouts, Yale and Harvard type; colliers, supply vessels, refrigerating ships, repair ships, hospital ships, auxiliary gunboats, the Gloucester and Scorpion type, and many other similar important craft. Allowing without any reserve that 200 officers would be necessary to man these auxiliary vessels, the total number of officers necessary in order to send to sea the navy which Congress has ordered constructed will be 826 plus 200, or 1,026."

During the consideration of this subject your committee called upon the Department to furnish a statement of the number and duties of the present officers of the Navy. The following statement was furnished, which shows that there are 1,017 line officers, including the cadets, 993 of whom are eligible for sea duty, 709 of whom are on board vessels at the present time or doing duty upon seas, 272 performing duty on shore, 11 on the sick list, and 1 on the waiting list:

[c] In addition to this number, 1 other officer, not eligible for sea duty, is performing duty on shore.
[d] In addition to this number, 4 other officers, not eligible for sea duty, are performing duty on shore.

It will be seen from the above that we have comparatively few officers that we could call upon to man the new ships now being constructed and at the same time keep in commission those already built. Your committee saw but one remedy to meet the problem of more officers, and that was to increase the number of cadets at the Naval Academy, and accordingly a provision has been inserted in the bill providing for the appointment of 500 additional cadets, 125 each year during the next four years succeeding the passage of this act. Each Senator, Member, and Delegate of the House of Representatives is to have the appointment of 1 and the President 24. For the first year each Senator makes an appointment, and the President one-fourth of those allotted to him, and a sufficient number by Members and Delegates to bring the total up to 125. During each succeeding year the President appoints one-fourth of the number allotted to him and Members and Delegates enough to bring the total up to 125 for each year. This, it will be seen, is a temporary measure, and is in effect only for four years. After that time it is hoped that the present law, which provides for the appointment of a cadet by each Member and Delegate every four years, will produce a sufficient number of officers to satisfy the demands of our growing Navy.

MORE MEN.

The Chief of the Bureau of Navigation has set forth in a communication to the committee the necessity for the enlistment of more men. He estimates that to provide for the manning of our ships now under construction we will need approximately 14,000 men. Under the appropriation act of last year we provided 5,000 of these, who are now under training, and in this year's bill we have made a further increase of 3,000, which is all that will be necessary at the present time.

MARINE CORPS.

The Marine Corps is the military branch of the naval service. The following table shows the estimates for 1903, the amounts carried by this bill, and the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year:

Marine Corps.

	Estimated, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.
Pay	$1,707,649.23	$1,707,649.23	$1,706,504.23
Provisions	396,071.50	396,071.50	371,071.50
Clothing	340,000.00	340,000.00	290,190.54
Fuel	35,000.00	35,000.00	30,000.00
Military stores	40,297.00	40,297.00	46,297.00
Transportation and recruiting	100,000.00	100,000.00	70,000.00
Repair of barracks	50,000.00	50,500.00	24,000.00
Forage	6,000.00	11,000.00	6,000.00

Contingent	91,700.00	91,700.00	61,700.00
Public works	206,000.00	145,500.00	178,000.00
Total	2,993,465.73	2,938,465.73	2,798,520.27

From the above table it will be seen that there is an increase of $139,945.46 over that of last year.

There is an increase of $25,000 under the item of provisions and also approximately $50,000 under that of clothing and $30,000 under that of transportation and recruiting, which are regarded necessary by the commandant of the Marine Corps. An increase in the contingent item of $30,000 is also recommended, but a reduction has been made in the public works of approximately $33,000.

INCREASE OF THE NAVY.

The provision for the increase of the Navy is the last general heading of the naval appropriation bill, and one which, perhaps, excites the most popular interest, inasmuch as it provides for the further construction of ships already authorized and the naval programme.

The following table shows the estimates for this year, the amount carried by this bill, and the amount appropriated last year:

Increase of the Navy.

	Estimates, 1903.	Carried by bill.	Appropriated, 1902.
Construction and machinery	$17,303,010	$13,303,010	$21,000,000
Armor and armament	6,000,000	9,000,000	4,000,000
Equipment	400,000	400,000	400,000
Equipping navy-yards		175,000

As will be seen from the above table, there is a reduction of $4,000,000 from the estimates in the item of construction and machinery for work on new vessels already authorized. The Chief Constructor and the Chief Engineer reported to the committee that owing to the delay in the delivery of material, strikes, and other causes the work on vessels building has not progressed as rapidly as anticipated at the time the estimates were submitted, and accordingly the reduction above mentioned has been made.

The following table shows the ships now in process of construction and the degree of their completion on April 1, 1902:

ARMOR AND ARMAMENT.

Your committee recommends under the increase of the Navy an appropriation, as above shown, of $9,000,000 for armor and armament. The original estimates submitted to the committee called for $6,000,000 for this object, but an additional estimate was sent in by the Secretary of the Navy, upon recommendation of the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, asking that this appropriation might be increased to $9,000,000 in view of the fact that the armor makers are furnishing armor much faster than was expected; and in this connection it might be said that an item of $4,000,000 was inserted in the urgent deficiency bill in order to carry out the terms of the contracts. It might also be of interest to quote from the letter forwarded to the committee from the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance:

"1. The Bureau finds that since the estimates were made the monthly expenditures under this appropriation have increased a great deal and now average about $800,000 per month, which amounts to over $9,600,000 per year, and to carry it through the remainder of this fiscal year it has been obliged to ask for an urgent deficiency of $4,000,000 in addition to the $4,000,000 appropriated in the last naval bill.

"2. This great increase was not anticipated, nor did the experience of the Bureau lead it to expect such. The increase in expenditures is mainly caused by the unusual rapidity of delivery of armor and of miscellaneous ordnance supplies; by the ship contractors urging the delivery of outfits earlier than anticipated, calling for overtime work at the naval gun factory to meet the demands; by the armor manufacturers delivering armor at a much more rapid rate than was thought would be the case when the contracts therefor were placed, and by the payment of obligations incurred during past years."

It will be recalled that the Secretary of the Navy, under the authority given him by Congress in the naval appropriation act of two years ago, contracted with the armor-plate companies for the manufacture of 37,000 tons of armor for all of the ships authorized by Congress, at the price of $420 per ton plus the Krupp royalty, not to exceed $24.32 per ton, and the Harvey royalty, not to exceed $11.20 per ton, which latter royalty is still a matter of dispute between the Department and the Harvey Company.

NAVAL PROGRAMME.

The naval appropriation act of last year contained the following provision:

"The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to prepare the plans and specifications of two seagoing battle ships and two armored cruisers, carrying the most suitable armor and armament for vessels of their class, and to submit to Congress a general description of such battle ships and cruisers on the first Monday in December next; and the said Secretary in preparing said plans and description shall review and further consider the questions whether said ships shall be sheathed or unsheathed, what should be the weight and extent of the armor therefor, what should be the form and location of the turrets, whether any changes should be made in the number and kind of guns of the various sizes heretofore constituting the armament of similar ships, what, if any, torpedo tubes should be built into large ships, to what extent electricity should be used for auxiliary purposes, and all other questions which have arisen and are now pending among naval architects and ordnance experts concerning the construction of battle ships and cruisers under modern conditions; and said Secretary shall, to such an extent as he may deem expedient, report to Congress in connection with said description his opinion upon the foregoing questions."

In compliance with the above the Secretary of the Navy transmitted to Congress a report prepared by the Board of Construction, in which report the several matters set forth in the above provision are fully discussed and recommendations made with respect thereto, which recommendations were approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

The committee recommend that for the purpose of further increasing the naval establishment of the United States the President is hereby authorized to have constructed two first-class battle ships carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful ordnance for vessels of their class upon a trial displacement of about 16,000 tons, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,212,000 each; two first-class armored cruisers of about 14,500 tons trial displacement, carrying the heaviest armor and most powerful armament for vessels of their class, and to have the highest practicable speed and great radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $4,659,000 each; two gunboats of about 1,000 tons trial displacement, to cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $382,000 each.

In view of the fact that there is some public sentiment favorable to building ships in our Government navy-yards, it has been deemed advisable by the committee to insert a provision in the appropriation bill of this year leaving it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to build any or all ships in Government yards, but making it mandatory on him to construct at least one battle ship or one armored cruiser in such navy-yard as he may designate, as an experiment; and it is further provided that he shall keep an accurate account of all expenditures for labor and material in the inspection and construction of such ship and report to Congress at each session, and upon the completion of said ship he shall make a detailed report, showing the relative cost of one built by the Government and one by contract. It is believed by your committee that nothing short of an experiment of this kind will settle the question that has vexed many minds, and at the same time will show whether private contractors have been reasonable in their bids, and furthermore be a basis for future guidance in the continued construction of our Navy. An appropriation of $175,000 is recommended for each yard in which a ship is built.

The following table shows the approximate cost of a battle ship, an armored cruiser, and a gunboat:

Type.	Displacement.	Cost exclusive of armor and armament.	Armor.	Armament.	Total cost.
	Tons.
Battle ship	16,000	$4,211,920	$1,800,000	$1,520,857	$7,532,777
Armored cruiser	14,500	4,659,250	1,175,000	880,038	6,714,288
Gunboat	1,000	381,840	Nothing.	128,908	510,748

The complete cost of 2 first-class battle ships, 2 first-class armored cruisers, and 2 gunboats, with total tonnage of 63,000 tons, recommended in this bill, will be approximately $29,500,000. These battle ships and cruisers will be larger than any heretofore authorized by Congress, and the plans recommended by the board of construction have already excited the favorable comment of the naval authorities abroad. The committee is of the opinion that in recommending the above naval programme it is making a substantial and healthy increase of our Navy, and one which will meet everywhere with popular favor.

COST OF SHIPS OF NEW NAVY.

Vessels of the new Navy, built since 1882 and completed to December 31, 1901, number 79, and have cost $124,899,091.89. Of these, 24 are torpedo boats and 55 are vessels of other classes, as shown in the table below.

The vessels building number 59, and of these 32 are torpedo boats and destroyers, leaving 27 vessels of other classes. The estimated cost of completing these vessels is (June 30, 1900) $110,183,118. Deducting the appropriations for these vessels—

Fiscal year 1901	$17,140,699
Fiscal year 1902	29,400,000
Balance on hand in Treasury June 30, 1900	9,562,406
Balance to credit of appropriation for submarine torpedo boat	105,635
Amounts since deposited or allowed on submarine torpedo boat	94,365

shows a balance of $53,880,013 required to be appropriated to complete the said vessels, outside of any appropriation that may be made or vessels authorized by the present naval bill. Therefore the total number of vessels of the Navy, built and building, is 138, of which 56 are torpedo boats and destroyers, and the total cost will be $235,082,209.89.

The above table does not include the protected cruisers Albany and New Orleans, the gunboat Topeka, nor the torpedo boats Manley and Somers, vessels purchased during the Spanish war; neither does it include the submarine torpedo boat Holland, nor captured vessels.

It will be seen from the above table that while we have built and are building, all told, 138 ships, yet comparatively few of them have any real fighting value. Our naval prowess lies almost entirely in our 18 battle ships, 8 armored cruisers, and 21 protected cruisers. The rest of our ships would cut but little figure in actual war. Ships of the battle line practically alone determine the naval strength of a nation.

NAVAL PROGRAMMES OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

[a] No ships authorized in 1901-2, 1902-3.
[b] 1902-3, completing programme of 1900. A complete programme is to be considered; no information available, 1902-3.
[c] Included in battle ships, as in German budget.

Of all the countries, Germany has been building during the last few years faster than any of the others. Her shipbuilding programme started in 1898 and will be completed in 1908, possibly in 1907, instead of 1916, as first planned. Her programme contemplates the following new vessels: Four squadrons each of 8 battle ships, 2 battle ships for flagships, 4 battle ships in reserve. Besides these there are to be 14 large cruisers, 38 smaller cruisers, and 16 divisions of torpedo boats of 6 each. This programme will give her in all 38 battle ships, 14 large cruisers, 38 smaller cruisers, and 96 torpedo boats. After the completion of this programme the plan contemplates new constructions to replace ships which, though still serviceable, may have reached the prescribed age limit.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE NEW NAVY.

In 1883 we began the construction of our present Navy, and down to 1901, inclusive, $655,664,000 was appropriated. Of this sum $590,393,000 has been expended, leaving an unexpended balance of $65,271,000. The following communication from the Secretary of the Navy, with the accompanying statement, shows the amount of appropriations made each year since the beginning of the construction of the new Navy, and the disposition of the same:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 2, 1902.

SIR: Replying to your letter of the 17th ultimo, requesting to be furnished with a statement showing the amount of the appropriations made each year since the beginning of the construction of the new Navy; how much of these appropriations has been used each year, and how much has been covered back into the Treasury; how much of that expended has been used under the different bureaus; how much for the maintenance of the personnel of the Navy, and how much has gone into the public works at navy-yards and naval stations. I have the honor to inclose herewith tabular statements, prepared by the Paymaster-General of the Navy, showing the appropriations, expenditures, and balances pertaining to the naval establishment, by fiscal years from 1883 to 1901, inclusive, as follows:

Statement No. 1. Maintenance of personnel.

Nos. 1 A and 1 B. Pay and subsistence, respectively, as combined in statement No. 1.

No. 2. Appropriations and expenditures under all annual appropriations, by bureaus, for each year separately.

Nos. 2 A and 2 B. Summaries of statement No. 2, by years and bureaus, respectively.

No. 3. Appropriations and expenditures for public works.

No. 4. Increase of the Navy.

No. 5. Special appropriation for specific objects.

Nos. 6, 6 A, and 6 B. War appropriations and expenditures for Marine Corps and miscellaneous appropriations.

No. 7. Summary of appropriations, expenditures, and balances shown in detail by statements from No. 1 to 6 B, inclusive.

The Paymaster-General, in forwarding the above statements, reports as follows:

"In preparing these statements odd dollars and cents have been discarded, but the aggregates are approximately correct. It will be noted from the summary statement, No. 7, that the total of the appropriations for the entire period of nineteen years is $865,664,000; expenditures, $590,393,000; balances, $65,271,000, of which the sum of $25,805,000 for increase of the Navy and public works remained available for future expenditures on account of these objects, the balance of about $40,000,000 having been or will be carried to the surplus fund of the Treasury. Adding to the above the total appropriations of about $82,000,000 for the current fiscal year makes the grand total of appropriations for the twenty years since the beginning of the new Navy approximately $738,000,000."

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG, Secretary,

Hon. GEO. EDMUND FOSS,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be published and bound 6,000 copies of the State papers and all correspondence bearing upon the purchase of the Territory of Louisiana by the United States, including the treaty of purchase, 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives and 2,000 for the use of the Senate.

House concurrent resolution 15.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed and bound, by photolithographic process, with an introduction of not to exceed 25 pages, to be prepared by Dr. Cyrus Adler, librarian of the Smithsonian Institution, for the use of Congress, 9,000 copies of Thomas Jefferson's "Morals of Jesus of Nazareth," as the same appears in the National Museum, 3,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 6,000 copies for the use of the House.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 5735. An act to fix the compensation of criers and bailiffs in the United States courts; and

S. R. 98. Joint resolution appropriating the sum of $500,000, including the $200,000 already appropriated, for the relief of the French West Indies and St. Vincent.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to my colleague [Mr. RIXEY].

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to make a partisan speech, but to submit a few practical observations upon the bill.

As stated by the chairman of the committee, this bill carries something like $77,000,000—$442,000 less than was carried in the bill for 1902; but the chairman might have gone further and stated that it carries $11,000,000 more than was carried in the bill for 1901, and $24,000,000 more than was carried in the bill for 1900—an excess over 1900 of nearly as much as the whole naval establishment cost ten years ago. This bill carries less than was estimated for by some $20,000,000, and the Naval Committee deserves credit for the way in which it has brought down these estimates to the amount carried in the bill, and too much credit can not be given to the patience and untiring and painstaking care which the chairman of the committee has given to this subject.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we can never expect to have a naval bill which will carry less than the present bill. This bill would carry more than the bill for 1902 except for two items. There is a reduction of $7,000,000, as compared with the bill for 1902, for hulls and machinery. There is also a reduction in the bill for 1903, as compared with the bill for 1902, of $2,500,000 for the Naval Academy at Annapolis. These two items make $9,500,000. Taking from that the $442,000 reduction in this bill, and we have really an increase for the naval establishment proper of some $9,000,000.

I take it we may never expect to see the naval bill less than it is as present. This bill carries a provision for 500 new cadets at Annapolis. It carries a provision for 3,000 enlisted men, and it is to be followed by a bill to increase the Medical Corps, the Paymaster's Corps, the pharmacists, and I suppose the Marine Corps. I do not mention these matters in a critical spirit, because I realize that when we build ships we have got to provide the men to man them, and we have got to pay the expenses for that purpose. The time to consider these questions is when we are up against the proposition to build ships.

The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs says that it takes a thousand dollars to keep one of these battle ships in commission one day. I think he has greatly underestimated the amount, for Admiral O'Neil states that for the battle ship Alabama the sum of $70,000 was spent for target practice alone in six months. This is $449 for every day, Sundays excepted, for target practice, and I take it that the expense for keeping a battle ship in commission can not be less than $2,000 a day.

I think much of the expense is due to the unfortunate organization of the Navy Department. We have eight separate bureaus in the naval establishment, each bureau presided over by an admiral, each bureau, as I understand it, having jurisdiction over the expenditures for that bureau, and almost every bureau having control of millions of dollars. Some of these bureaus interlap, so that it is impossible to tell where the jurisdiction of one stops and another commences. There are rivalries and contentions, so much so that the Secretary of the Navy has been called upon more than once to settle the jurisdiction of the several bureaus.

The retiring Secretary of the Navy saw the disadvantage of so many bureaus, and time and again he earnestly advocated in his annual reports that at least three of these bureaus should be consolidated. No attention was paid to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, except that bills were introduced and referred to the Naval Committee, and there they have slept. In the Secretary's last hearing before the Naval Committee, less than thirty days ago, he was asked his opinion as to consolidating some of these bureaus. The Secretary said he was then about to go out of office and that it was not worth while to refer to the matter. I quote his statement:

I have tried every year up to this year, when I have abandoned the attempt simply because I can not carry it through, to consolidate three of our bureaus which I believe could perfectly well be consolidated. I think most of you differ from me in that respect, but it leads to a triple expense. In the yards, where we are either building ships under contract or repairing them at our own yards, the Bureau of Construction and Repair will have an inspector, the Bureau of Steam Engineering will have an inspector, and the Bureau of Equipment will have an inspector. Often in these cases one inspector could superintend all the work. There is a triplication of clerical and other expense which I think might easily be avoided as well as greater efficiency obtained by consolidation.

However, it is not worth while to refer to this matter, because I am overruled by the committee and also resisted by the Bureau officers who do not like to give up their jurisdiction. It is not only the case of the tail wagging the dog, but three tails wagging the dog.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the next matter which I want to call your attention to is on page 38 of the draft of the bill——

Mr. VANDIVER. Before we leave the subject the Secretary has just mentioned, let me ask if the question has been adjudicated as to whether it is possible to consolidate these bureaus I infer from the statement of the honorable Secretary that he is not supported in the proposition, and as I had not heard of the question being settled I ask for information.

Secretary LONG. What I am saying is, I think the three bureaus are opposed to consolidation. The Bureau of Construction under its former chief was in favor of it, but not after I made my recommendation to Congress that the head of the consolidated bureau should be either an officer of the line or of the staff.

The CHAIRMAN. I will say I introduced the Department bill which was sent up in the last Congress, but the question has never been considered by the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; in the Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth Congresses.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Was there any discussion about it?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has never come up for consideration by the committee. It has never been voted upon.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It was wise, by the expressions made, that it was not voted upon at that time.

Secretary LONG. It is not worth while to go into it now.

It seems to me that the retiring Secretary of the Navy has done all that he could to remedy this crying evil which he says entails unnecessary expense upon the Government, and it does seem to me that the committee of which I am a member might do well to heed the recommendations of the head of the Department and try to consolidate these bureaus for the purpose of saving expense. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that the new Secretary of the Navy, young, active, vigorous, and with a reputation to make, may be more successful in his efforts to reform the naval establishment in respect to these different bureaus and place the whole upon a solid business basis.

As an illustration of the reckless way in which some of these bureaus send in their estimates, I will read briefly from the statement of Admiral Endicott of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. He sent in his estimates, which were so grossly excessive that he was notified that he must cut them down and that the committee would only allow what was absolutely necessary.

I will read extracts from only one page of his hearings. Others are almost similar. Starting at the bottom of page 3:

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "blacksmith shop for steam engineering, $42,000."

Admiral ENDICOTT. That item can be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "foundry for steam engineering, $90,000."

Admiral ENDICOTT. That item can be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "pattern shop for steam engineering, $56,000."

Admiral ENDICOTT. That item can be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "coppersmith shop for steam engineering, $44,000."

Admiral ENDICOTT. I would let that item go out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "Power house and stack for steam engineering, $35,000."

Admiral ENDICOTT. I think that item should remain in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "Steel-plant building for construction and repair (to cost $240,000), $100,000."

Admiral ENDICOTT. I have consulted the constructor upon that item, and while it is a thing that ought to be done, it is not necessary at the present time. The constructor feels that if he has to give up anything he would rather give up items at Portsmouth and Boston.

The CHAIRMAN. The next item is, "Plate metal workers' shop for construction and repair, $75,000." That is a new shop?

Admiral ENDICOTT. Yes, sir. I would let that item be stricken from the bill.

And so it goes. Some millions were struck out by the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Naval Committee is entitled to credit for sifting these estimates, but the recklessness with which these bureau officers, or some of them, send in their estimates to the Naval Committee is to be condemned. I insist upon it that the bureaus ought to be remodeled, that some of them ought to be consolidated, and that everything that comes to the Naval Committee ought to come with the sanction and indorsement of the head of the Department.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly.

Mr. DAYTON. Do you mean to say that these estimates do not come to the head of the Navy Department?

Mr. RIXEY. I suppose they do come to the head of the Navy Department, but——

Mr. DAYTON. Are they not all examined by him and sent by him to the Naval Committee?

Mr. RIXEY. I can only state to you what I suppose would be the case from what I see in the hearings—that he has never examined them. He may have done so; if he has, it does not look very creditable to the head of the Navy Department, in my judgment.

Mr. DAYTON. Is it not very well known to the gentleman that while these estimates were cut down that none of them were for works that were not advisable and desirable in order to build up the naval establishment; and these changes were made, or these cuts were made, because the committee determined first that it would not engage in new constructions at navy-yards, or, at least, very little, and that Admiral Endicott was instructed that anything not thought advisable by him, looking to the future, that it must be cut out. Was not that his reason?

Mr. RIXEY. I am not a member of the subcommittee, but Admiral Endicott had been informed that the committee would not allow many of the items he sent up, and I think properly so informed; and when millions are cut out, it shows that he was reckless in his statements, as I understand it.

Mr. DAYTON. I hope the gentleman will pardon me. I know he does not want to be unfair, and he is not just to Admiral Endicott in the statement that he has made.

Mr. RIXEY. I will permit the gentleman to ask a question, but when the gentleman proposes to lecture me I shall not permit that.

Mr. DAYTON. You know he represents all the different branches of the Navy Department in public works, do you not?

Mr. RIXEY. I understand he does.

Mr. DAYTON. You know that the reasons for these different items coming from the different bureaus is because these buildings were desirable and wanted?

Mr. RIXEY. No; I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. DAYTON. You admit you are not a member of the subcommittee?

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly. I can not yield to my friend for him to make a speech in my time.

Mr. DAYTON. I simply want you to do justice to an honorable man in what you say.

Mr. RIXEY. I have no doubt Admiral Endicott is a first-class man in his profession; but anyone who will take these estimates must come to the conclusion, in my judgment, that he was reckless in stating what he desired. That there never was any necessity for making these appropriations is shown by the fact that the Naval Committee has cut them down some million dollars. In addition to this, Mr. Chairman, I have a statement here, and I am sorry that the gentleman from West Virginia has left.

Mr. DAYTON. I am here.

Mr. RIXEY. I have a statement here from Admiral Bradford, in which he says, so far as he knows, there is no reason for the very great increase in the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Mr. DAYTON. I did not hear the statement.

Mr. RIXEY. The statement is this, that Admiral Bradford has stated, and he is the chief of one of the bureaus, that he knows of no reason for the great increase in another one of these bureaus; that is, the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Mr. DAYTON. Will the gentleman point to that statement? I have no recollection of it.

Mr. RIXEY. I will read it to you. In the hearings Admiral Bradford said:

The average appropriation, not including "Increase of the Navy" salaries, and public works, for the Bureaus of Equipment, Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Ordnance, from 1890 to 1897, inclusive, was as follows:

Bureau of Equipment	$1,170,252.29
Bureau of Construction and Repair	1,262,222.50
Bureau of Steam Engineering	849,032.52
Bureau of Ordnance	412,153.00

Average for the same bureaus from 1898 to 1902, inclusive.

Bureau of Equipment	$3,608,752.08
Bureau of Construction and Repair	5,784,081.50
Bureau of Steam Engineering	3,115,800.00
Bureau of Ordnance	3,360,415.00

Per cent of increase in appropriation for these bureaus for the second period.

Bureau of Equipment	3.09
Bureau of Construction and Repair	4.58
Bureau of Steam Engineering	3.67
Bureau of Ordnance	8.01

Attention is called to the fact that the average appropriation for the Bureau of Equipment and Bureau of Construction and Repair for the first period was about the same, being a little larger (less than $100,000) for the Bureau of Construction and Repair. For the second period, however, the average appropriation for the Bureau of Construction and Repair is 60 per cent greater than that for the Bureau of Equipment. So far as I am aware, there is no reason why the same relative expenditures for the two bureaus should not exist to-day as formerly. Attention is called to these expenditures only as an indication of the care that has been exercised by the Bureau of Equipment in the expenditure of money.

Now, it will be seen that Admiral Bradford says that there is no reason for the 60 per cent increase.

Mr. DAYTON. So far as he knows.

Mr. RIXEY. So far as he knows, and he ought to know, because he is at the head of the Bureau of Equipment.

Mr. DAYTON. But not at the head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Mr. RIXEY. Certainly not; but, as the former Secretary of the Navy suggested, the Bureau of Equipment and the Bureau of Construction and Repair should be consolidated.

Now I will read a little further from Admiral Bradford's statement:

The appropriations, not including "Increase of the Navy," salaries, and public works, for the Bureaus of Equipment, Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Ordnance for the fiscal year 1902 were as follows:

Bureau of Equipment	$3,985,000
Bureau of Construction and Repair	7,335,000
Bureau of Steam Engineering	3,446,000
Bureau of Ordnance	2,481,749

Similar estimates of same bureaus for fiscal year 1903.

Bureau of Equipment	$4,985,000
Bureau of Construction and Repair	9,470,000
Bureau of Steam Engineering	4,366,000
Bureau of Ordnance	3,408,000

Now, Admiral Bradford states that he knows no reason why the same relative proportion should not exist to-day that existed then, and yet the estimates and appropriations for the Bureau of Construction and Repair are now 100 per cent more than for the Bureau of Equipment.

Under such circumstances, Mr. Chairman, it is no wonder that protests come to this House from conservative sources. I suppose every member of this House has received a protest signed by 135 prominent citizens of Boston protesting against any such great expenditures as were estimated for, but which have been cut down to some extent. The protest is as follows:

Citizens of Boston and vicinity, without reference to party relations, have united in this remonstrance against the proposed vast increase of naval expenditures:

To the President, the Secretary of the Navy, and the members of Congress:

We regret to learn that the estimates for the Navy for the coming fiscal year aggregate nearly $100,000,000.

This is about five times the amount expended only ten years ago. The new estimates amount to an average cost of over $6 for every family in the country. Half this sum applied to education would support 5,000 manual training schools, at nearly $10,000 apiece, throughout the United States.

We believe that it is a needless extravagance to take for this purpose anything like one hundred millions out of the pockets of the people.

We hold that the maintenance of a vast machinery of war is not only a serious burden upon the people, but a positive menace to the peace of the world.

For more than a hundred years the United States has borne the honorable tradition of a nation which had no need of great armaments. We urge all who believe in justice, good will, and humanity as the great safeguards of the interests of the nation to exert their influence to maintain this high distinction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will take but a short time to consider another question which was considered at length by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that is the question of where we are to build the ships authorized in this bill. The chairman of the committee challenged a statement sent out from certain sources that the navy-yards have cost upward of $100,000,000. I believe, however, he admitted that they have cost from seventy to eighty million dollars. I understand that the 46 private shipyards of the country have cost about $68,000,000. Our 10 navy-yards have cost certainly $70,000,000 and perhaps $100,000,000. The 46 private yards have cost about $68,000,000.

Now, I want to ask that if these 46 contractors, with their shipyards costing on an average a million and a half dollars apiece, can build battle ships, can not our 10 navy-yards, costing on the average of from seven to ten millions, also build them? Tell me they can not build as cheaply as contractors! Why, sir, the plant is already provided; the Government pays no interest upon it; it pays no insurance; the constructors are educated by the Government at Annapolis; it has the very best talent in the country; and you tell me that the Government, with these plants all provided, with the men trained for the purpose, with no interest and no insurance to pay, can not build ships as cheap as contractors who have to provide interest on their plant and insurance and profits! Such a claim is not creditable to the Navy Department nor to any portion of it from its chief down to the laboring man employed by the Department at the navy-yards.

The chairman of the committee, as I understood it, contended that one reason was that the men in the employ of the Government only worked eight hours, whereas the private shipyards worked their men ten hours. I want to remind him that that reason is likely to be removed; that the Committee on Labor of this House has reported a bill providing that no contractor shall work laborers longer than eight hours upon Government work. So far as that goes that is likely to be avoided in the future.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that some of the best ships in the Navy have been built in the Government shipyards?

Mr. RIXEY. Four of them, I think, have been built in the Government shipyards. The illustration and the comparison which the gentleman from Illinois makes in regard to ships heretofore built in the navy-yards are unfair. When the Maine and the Texas were built the privilege was given to the contractors to take the contract upon the limit fixed by Congress. They declined to take the contract, and the Government was compelled to build these ships at its navy-yards. It had to build them at a time when the navy-yards were not equipped as they are now. It had to build them when it was not prepared properly for the work. Hence it is unfair to make such a comparison at this time.

But if it were fair, Mr. Chairman, let us see how the prices charged by contractors themselves have varied. In 1890, when only two concerns were competing for construction of ships, it cost to build the Indiana $579 per ton. Five years later, when the Newport News Company was in the field, the Kearsarge was built for $334 per ton, involving a difference of $1,673,000 on a single ship.

In 1888 the Columbian Iron Works built the hull and machinery of the Montgomery for $486 per ton. In 1893 the Newport News Company built the hull and machinery of the Helena and the Nashville for $200 per ton—a difference of $286 per ton as compared with the cost of building the Montgomery. In 1895 the Oregon cost $610 per ton; but the same contracting parties were willing to build the new Maine for $404 per ton, and the Wisconsin for $393 per ton. The contract for building the Virginia was given to the Newport News Company at $478 per ton. The same company built the Kearsarge and the Kentucky at $317 per ton—a difference of over a million dollars on a single ship.

When you come to compare the cost of building ships you will see that they vary under many conditions. I take it that the cost of building ships in Government yards now can not be estimated by what it cost in 1888.

Again, in regard to the building of the Maine and the Texas, Constructor Bowles testified that many things which he had to have in the navy-yard were bought by the Government and charged to the Texas. I remember that as to one piece of machinery he was asked where it was charged, and he said it was charged to the Texas. He was then asked where that machinery was now, and he answered: "It is still in the navy-yard and doing good work." It is unfair to take the cost of building the Texas in 1888 as an indication of what it would cost to build such a vessel at the present time.

A great deal has been said by the gentleman from Illinois in regard to the agitation for this matter having been stirred up by the Chamber of Commerce of Vallejo, Cal. I remind the gentleman that this agitation for the building of ships in our navy-yards did not originate with that chamber of commerce. I will remind him that two years ago when there was a minority report filed from the Committee on Naval Affairs one of the contentions was that while the Government had these vast and valuable navy-yards it ought to utilize them by building some of its ships in them.

In regard to these cards of the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce which have been sent out, and which the chairman of the committee has so vigorously attacked, I did not expect to say anything about them. So far as I know, they contain a great deal of information and a great many facts. In one of the hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. O'Connell, who is the head of one of the labor organizations, was asked by one of the members of the committee whether the statements made in these cards were correct. He said "Yes." He was then asked, "How do you know?" And he replied, "Because I have examined the reports at the Navy Department, and I know the statements made in those cards to be true."

Mr. Chairman, that was the time to deny the correctness of those statements; that was the time when Admiral Bowles or anyone else desiring to deny those statements of fact could have sent his denial to the committee, without waiting until this bill was called up for consideration in the House, and then, for the first time, sending here written statements which have been seen by no one but the chairman of the committee, certainly not by the full committee.

Mr. Chairman, it is admitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] that three years ago Admiral Bowles, who was then constructor, advocated the building of ships in the navy-yards, and he says of course constructors favor the building of ships in navy-yards. It seems to me this is rather an unnecessary reflection upon Admiral Bowles. I might as well say, "Of course, since he has been elevated to the official family of the Secretary of the Navy and become the head of the Bureau, that he partakes, without reasons for his change of opinion, of the views and opinions of the other chiefs of the bureaus." But, sir, I do not charge that Admiral Bowles has changed his opinion simply because he is elevated to the position at the head of the Bureau, and I insist upon it that his opinion as constructor is as valuable as his present opinion at the head of the Bureau.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to his testimony, while he was a constructor and the head of one of the navy-yards, I would refer briefly to his testimony before the Naval Committee since he has been at the head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and I state that in that testimony he again recommends the building of ships in the navy-yards. Admiral Bowles was asked by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] if the building of a small vessel in the navy-yards, as a practical test, would not be sufficient. He replied:

> I do not think any such test would amount to anything. I think there is a pretty good evidence of the question already. I believe that if this Government finds it necessary and desirable to build ships in the navy-yards as a matter of regular practice that we can do it as economically and as well as it can be done by contract—> but we must be free from any embarrassment in the way of leaves of absence. As a proof of it I will say it is being regularly done now in the English dockyards. They are building now a little more than they ever have, and they are keeping the cost down lower than the contract price in the private yards.

Now, this is the opinion of Admiral Bowles since he has been at the Navy Department—

Now, one reason given by the gentleman from Illinois for the fact, as he stated, that England could build ships in her navy-yards cheaper than she could by private contracts, and that we could not do so, was that there the price in the navy-yard was less than it was in the contractor's yard. I do not know as to these facts, but as I understand it the law here is that instead of the price in the navy-yards being from 30 to 40 per cent higher, it requires the price of the navy-yard to be gauged by what it is in the neighborhood. As a matter of fact, the price paid mechanics at Norfolk is less than the price paid at Brooklyn Navy-Yard, and the reason is that the price paid to mechanics outside of the navy-yard in New York is greater than that paid them in Norfolk. There is no reason why they should be greater. Admiral Bowles again says, in response to a question by Mr. TAYLER:

> Could you repair with more economy if you were constructing?
> Admiral BOWLES. Yes.

In other words, we would gain not only in the building of the vessels, but we would save money in the repairing of them.

> When you say that, you mean you would get a larger force and keep them constantly at work?
> Admiral BOWLES. Yes.

This testimony is emphatically that it is to the interest of this Government to build at least a portion of our ships in the navy-yards. Another witness relied upon to some extent by those who oppose the building of ships in the navy-yards was Admiral O'Neil, who, I believe, a few years ago was opposed to navy-yard construction, but when he was asked by the committee what his opinion now was, he replied, the question being by Mr. DAYTON:

There is one other question I would like to ask you. I think you were interrogated a couple of years ago as to the wisdom of building ships in the navy-yards or by private contracts.

Admiral O'NEIL. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. Have you changed your views in regard to that?

Admiral O'NEIL. I don't remember what I said on that occasion. There used to be a provision in the naval appropriation bill that if, when the bids were opened, the Secretary found they could not be advantageously let, he was authorized to build one or more vessels at the navy-yards. That, however, was afterwards taken out of the bill. There is no doubt that the last time they got together on bids.

From this it seems the admiral is of the opinion that the contractors got together, made a combination, that they took the contracts for the battle ships and armored cruisers, costing from six to seven millions each, and divided them among themselves—no competitions in such a case to protect the Government:

The CHAIRMAN. It cost you a good deal to build them in the navy-yards?

Admiral O'NEIL. Yes; I think they can build ships now in the navy-yards as cheap as outside, because there is no question of profit; there is no question of interest on the investment, which is a great feature in private work. On the other hand, they have not the money incentive to expedite work, which incentive exists in the case of the private shipbuilder. No navy-yard could do to-day any worse than half of the private shipbuilders on the question of time.

Again the chairman says:

Would we not have to spend a good deal of time to get the navy-yards ready to build ships?

Admiral O'NEIL. No; the New York Navy-Yard can build a ship now.

Mr. DAYTON. We have to run the risk of carrying our own insurance?

Admiral O'NEIL. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. We have to run the risk of the finished product being a failure instead of a success?

Admiral O'NEIL. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. And we have to be governed by the eight-hour labor law?

Admiral O'NEIL. Yes; but that is getting pretty close to outside concerns now, with the laboring organizations and all that.

Mr. DAYTON. They run ten hours, I think. And on the question of the finished product, you think that the products of the navy-yards would be just as good?

Admiral O'NEIL. Yes; I think we would get a better product. It may cost a little more, but it ought not to if the work is carried on conscientiously.

Now, here is the opinion of Admiral O'Neil, who is one of the most experienced chiefs in the Navy Department, stating that the product will be better; that we can do as well or better in the matter of time, and that we can build as cheaply in the navy-yards as we can outside. I say the preponderance of the evidence in favor of the building Government ships in the navy-yards is overwhelming. In addition to this, we have the testimony of Constructor Stahl, of the Norfork yard; of Constructor Baxter, of the Boston yard, and of the representatives of all the labor organizations in this country, without an exception.

Mr. MAYNARD. Constructor Stahl is stationed at the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company, where the Government is building some ships.

Mr. RIXEY. Gentlemen insist that we are not in condition in the navy-yards to build ships. If we are not, then it is the fault of the people who have had charge of these yards. During the past year, as I understand it, we appropriated $10,000,000 to keep these yards in order. These yards have each cost us an average of from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000. Now, I read from an advertisement of one of the contractors, who has the contracts for building two battle ships, the New Jersey and the Rhode Island; one cruiser, the Des Moines, and two torpedo-boat destroyers. Let us see what is the value of his plant. I have his advertisement here. It first quotes from a communication by Benjamin Brooks in the Transcript, made a part of the advertisement:

If you would behold the American spirit in its purest, strongest, and most buoyant phase, catch it on the wing, so to speak, learn the rate at which things under its inspiring influence can be made to happen, and see how truly robust and promising an infant is a shipbuilding plant, reared under its guidance, at the tender age of twenty-two months, go to Fore River.

At Fore River two things have been going on—the building of ships and the installing of a plant to build them. Logically, the plant should come first, of course, but as a matter of fact the two enterprises have been carried on so side by side and intermingled that the ships, during the confusion, have managed somehow to come out ahead. This is most distinctly an American way of doing things—to start at nothing, to keep moving at all hazard, and decide upon conveniences and methods afterwards.

No even-minded European could ever proceed in such a manner, yet the scheme is a good one, economical, and not without foresight.

This distinctly American spur-of-the-moment way of getting a great plant together is one of the principal reasons for our being so many years ahead of the rest of the mechanical world.

There is at present outstanding $1,000,000 of preferred stock and $1,000,000 of common stock issued against a plant which has cost $1,500,000.

This plant, which is only twenty-two months old, costing a million and a half dollars, located at Fore River, Quincy, Mass., has contracts from the Government for the building of two battle ships, one cruiser, and two torpedo-boat destroyers. If this plant, twenty-two months old, with its million and a half capital, can build all these great ships at one and the same time, do not tell me that the New York Navy-Yard, with its plant valued at $20,000,000; the Norfolk Navy-Yard, with a plant valued at $6,000,000; the Mare Island Navy-Yard, valued at about the same amount, and the Boston Navy-Yard, valued at about the same amount, can not build them.

I say that if these shipbuilding concerns all over the country can build them and build them upon a profit, surely this Government, with its navy-yards all paid for and in complete order and kept so for the purpose of repairing ships, surely this Government, I say, can build its own ships in its navy-yards at less cost than can be done outside.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has this Government ever built a first-class battle ship at any of its navy-yards?

Mr. RIXEY. It built the Texas at Norfolk and the Maine at Brooklyn.

Mr. MAYNARD. The Texas was a second-class battle ship.

Mr. RIXEY. The Texas was a second-class battle ship.

Mr. MAYNARD. They have never tried to build a first-class battle ship at a Government navy-yard.

Mr. RIXEY. The testimony is overwhelming that they can do it. Now, I believe there is no difference of opinion as to the ability of this Government to build its ships. As to the advisability of it there may be some little difference of opinion.

I have read what Admiral Bowles said when he was a constructor. I have read what he stated when he was called before the Naval Committee, giving it as his opinion that we ought to build at least a portion of the ships in the navy-yards; and it was further stated, either by Admiral Bowles or some one else, that England builds the majority of her ships in her navy-yards; that France is building 50 per cent of hers, and that Russia is making an effort to build all of hers in her navy-yards.

When the Secretary of the Navy was heard before the Naval Committee on the 19th of April, just before he went out of office, he gave it as his opinion that ships ought not to be built in the Government navy-yards; and it may be due to the fact of the opposition of the late Secretary of the Navy that the whole Navy Department has for years been opposed to the building of any ships in the Government navy-yards. When he was before the committee, and after Admiral Bowles had already been heard, the Secretary stated that he desired to file certain statements of Admiral Bowles.

In these letters—two to the Secretary of the Navy and two addressed to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON]—Admiral Bowles gives it as his opinion that it will cost 25 per cent more to build vessels in the Government yards than it will to build them in the contractors' yards. Against this belated statement of Admiral Bowles, which comes in without any call on the part of the Navy Committee, and after he has twice testified—against that we place the testimony of every constructor who was called by the Naval Committee. In addition to that, I desire to give the opinion of Admiral Hichborn; and I take it that the House will agree with me that there has never been a better informed head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair than Admiral Hichborn.

In his last annual report to the Secretary of the Navy, which was sent to the House, he strongly advocates building ships in navy-yards. This was just before he left the Bureau. His recommendation is as follows:

Much has been said both in favor of and against the building of vessels in the navy-yards. The progress made in the improvement of yard plants and the ever-increasing need for a permanent skilled force ready for and capable of at all times taking up repairs of any character which the growth in "matériel" of the Navy entails makes it desirable that the question should be given careful consideration.

There is at the present time, in view of the prosperous condition of the shipbuilding industry and the number of naval vessels building and appropriated for, sufficient work to permit the assignment of a portion of the building work to the Government yards without there being a question of the withdrawal or withholding of necessary support and assistance through work given out to a private industry, the maintenance of which in a high state of efficiency is unquestionably of national importance. These conditions make it possible to eliminate from the discussion any questions of policy except such as affect economy and efficiency.

It has been the history of all the iron and steel navies in existence to-day that the building of the vessels was at first entirely confided to private industry, and that the existence of the nucleus of a steel fleet made it necessary that the governments who were their owners should themselves provide for repairing these vessels; and that, having provided the necessary plant for this purpose, the provision for the maintenance of the equally necessary though vastly more difficult thing to attain, viz, efficient working organization and adequate efficient personnel, forced them to undertake in their navy-yards a portion of the new building work.

Then, he says, England is building in her navy-yards 8 battle ships and 5 armored cruisers; France is building in her navy-yards 3 battle ships and 10 armored cruisers; Germany is building in her navy-yards 3 battle ships and 1 armored cruiser; Russia is building in her navy-yards 3 battle ships and 1 armored cruiser.

He goes on:

In the case of many of the European nations—for example, Denmark and Holland, maintaining smaller navies—so strongly is this necessity for a permanent, efficient navy-yard personnel felt that practically all the naval building work undertaken by them is carried out at their navy-yards.

What they have done and are doing is mentioned here solely to emphasize the fact that the unanimous testimony of experience has been and is that the execution of a certain amount of building work at the chief Government yards is necessary to the maintenance of such navy-yard staffs as a complete and efficient naval organization requires; and that, whatever disadvantages such a course entails, they are more than compensated for in the end. It is believed that we have reached that stage in a naval development—still considerably behind our national development—which forces upon us serious consideration of this step which other naval powers have found necessary and expedient. At the outset the disadvantages to be labored under will be considerable.

Time and experience will do much toward the alleviation or, possibly, the entire removal of many of these. While under existing conditions, in the case of the first vessels built in our navy-yards it may be expected that the cost will not be greatly different from—may even be somewhat greater than for—the same work executed by contract in the private shipyards, the Bureau believes that such a course once entered upon would demonstrate its desirability and practicability in an increased efficiency and economy in naval administration, regarded as a whole, without interference with a judicious policy of such Government encouragement of the shipbuilding industry as will keep the greatest number of establishments in a position to undertake and execute promptly any naval work which may be required.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the time has come to commence building ships in the navy-yards. The contractors are now building for the Government 59 ships. Twenty-seven of these ships will cost $117,000,000. All of these 59 ships are at present given out to contract, and Admiral O'Neil testifies that they will not be ready for delivery to the Government for two or three years. Why can not we at this time, when the private yards already have 59 of the Government ships, costing probably as much as $150,000,000, why can not we build the 4 great ships authorized by this bill in the navy-yards of this country?

The testimony taken by the Naval Committee shows that the navy-yards of this country are running not over one-half of their capacity; that when a ship comes in for repair they employ men, and when the ship is finished those men are discharged. They have difficulty in keeping up the force in the navy-yards. Let us give the 4 principal yards in this country the 2 battle ships and 2 armored cruisers authorized in this bill, and let us give them something to do, to give them continuous work, and I take it that not only will the repair work be done in a more satisfactory manner, but I believe these battle ships and armored cruisers will be the pride of this country and equal to anything that the shipbuilding yards have ever constructed. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERMAN, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14046 and had come to no resolution thereon.

CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS OF FIFTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. BACON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5383) providing that the circuit court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, on the first Monday in September in each year, to report it favorably with certain amendments, and to ask for the present consideration of the same.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 1, page 1, line 6, to strike out "September" and insert "October;" so as to make the section read:

That the circuit court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States is hereby authorized and required to hold one term of said court annually in the city of Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, on the first Monday in October in each year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 1, line 11, after the word "Georgia," to strike out the words "and in the southern judicial district of Florida;" so as to read:

That all appeals, writs of error, and other appellate proceedings which may, after date of this act, be taken or prosecuted from the circuit or district courts of the United States in the State of Georgia to the court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit shall be heard and disposed of by the said court of appeals at the terms of the court held in Atlanta in pursuance of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing that the circuit court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, on the first Monday in October in each year."

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the report from the House on the omnibus claims bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 13, 1902.

Resolved, That the House insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. MAHON, Mr. GIBSON, and Mr. SIMS be the managers of the conference on the part of the House with the following instructions: That the conferees be instructed not to agree to what is known as the Selfridge board findings in the Senate amendments.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, near the close of the session yesterday I had this matter laid over. I desired to examine the proceedings of the House as they would be shown in the RECORD this morning, because of the rather novel message sent by the House to the Senate, in which it proposed a conference, appointed conferees, and accompanied the message, making it a part of the message, with an instruction to the House conferees not to agree to certain propositions known as the award of the Selfridge board, which had been incorporated in the bill by the Senate.

I have looked carefully into the proceedings of the House, reading all that was said there, and I do not further object to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to agree to the conference asked by the House and to appoint the conferees. I have no doubt that the House had the technical right to instruct its conferees. I have no doubt on reading the proceedings that the House was morally constrained to instruct the conferees.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator why?

Mr. HALE. I was going to state why. It was stated, if I may refer to the debate, that in the consideration of the omnibus claims bill the so-called Selfridge claims were a subject of controversy and debate in the House, and a separate vote was taken upon them, and the House threw them out, thereby taking its position, as a coordinate body, against these claims, and thereby, as was stated, and as is reasonable, practically instructing the conferees to act in accordance with the action of the House.

Senators know that that is an invariable rule and practice in the Senate. In the course of proceedings upon any bill—upon an appropriation bill—if there is a controversy and the members of the Appropriation Committee are outvoted by the Senate and a proposition against them is carried and put upon a bill or struck out from the House bill, although the conferees have been defeated, and although the inclination and judgment of the conferees are in a certain direction, we always consider that those are subjects we are practically instructed upon, to insist as long as possible.

The only remedy the House had was to instruct. It would not have got that remedy but for a fact to which I call the attention of my friend from Wyoming; and I hope he will see to it hereafter in these important bills that no new matter is inserted in conference. A report was made in the House, and the point of order was taken, that there were three absolutely new items in the bill that had never been considered either by the House or the Senate, and upon that point of order the Presiding Officer ruled against the report. Therefore the House had the opportunity to instruct its conferees upon the so-called Selfridge part of the report. Otherwise, a report being submitted that comprehended all the other items that were not contested, the House would not quite likely be able to carry out its will upon the Selfridge matters, because of the force that would be arrayed for accepting the report on account of the other items that were in it.

Upon the technical matter of there being new items in the bill, the whole thing, by the ruling of the Chair, was thrown open to another conference, and then but two methods could be pursued—either to instruct its conferees or to appoint a new conference who would not give up the right of the House upon a matter in which it had taken ground; which, as Senators know, neither body likes to do. To dispossess and turn out the old conferees and appoint new ones is a thing rarely done, and instead of taking that course the House resorted to its only remedy—to instruct its conferees.

I find, on an examination, with the assistance of the clerks, into the records of the Senate, that question has been raised more than once, and it has been decided that the Senate may instruct its conferees upon particular matters, leaving only open, to what may be called "free conference subjects," matter upon which the Senate does not take that ground.

So I have no further objection to make to the motion of the Senator from Wyoming upon that point. The House, I should presume inadvertently, incorporated with its message its instructions to its own conferees. That undoubtedly should not be done. It is not customary, I think; but it was an inadvertence, and I presume the other body will take notice of it and will not fall into this error again. I do not think it is important enough now to make a report to send it back in order that the House may correct it. I think it is proper to call the attention of the Senate, and in this way it will come to the knowledge of the House, that we do not deem it a proper thing where instructions are given to the House conferees to make it a part of the message of the House which asks for a free conference; but, as I have said, I do not ask, and I do not think it would be advisable, to raise the question with the other body by sending back the report from the House to be so corrected.

Therefore, if the Senator from Wyoming and his associates, in whom we have great confidence, are willing to try it again upon another conference, with the instructions in their face, I see nothing else for us to do. It should be borne in mind——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question. I am not familiar with the details of the conference. Has there been a conference, or has there been more than one conference?

Mr. HALE. I do not know whether there has been more than one.

Mr. WARREN. One.

Mr. BACON. There has been one and this is the second?

Mr. HALE. This is the second, I understand.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. The House took the action because it was the only thing it could do. Of course, it will always be borne in mind by conferees that it is the moving body which attempts to change existing conditions that naturally yields. If the House sends over to us, as it does, propositions upon appropriation bills changing the law and the practice, and the Senate says, "We can not agree to that; it is a new proposition; the burden is upon you, and the Senate can not agree," the body moving yields. When the Senate puts on an amendment embodying some new proposition, some change of law, and the House declares affirmatively that it can not agree to it, the harder side of the conference is that of the body which moves and seeks to change existing conditions.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator for information, and I am sure to get it from the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I hope so.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator remember an instance of this kind before, where the House of Representatives has sent us a message asking for a further conference accompanied by a notification that it had instructed its conferees not to agree to certain items in the bill?

Mr. HALE. No; I have said that therein the House made a mistake. They had a right to instruct, but should not have incorporated it in the message sent to the Senate. But that being a technical matter, undoubtedly an inadvertence, I do not think it is worth the while to raise a controversy with the House on that point. I do not believe it will ever do it again. I hope the conferees will take up the matter again.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine what it is that the existing motion in the Senate proposes to do with this item?

Mr. HALE. I suppose it proposes to do like every motion where a conference is agreed to. It submits it to a new conference.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to make a remark, but I will wait until the Senator gets through, or I will do it now, as he thinks best.

Mr. HALE. If it is right on the point, the Senator can do it now.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand, when there is a motion in one body to adhere, instead of a mere motion to insist, a motion for a free conference is no longer open in the other body. The other body must either adhere, too, and the measure fails, or they must recede and concur with the other branch, and end the controversy in that way. That is the only thing, if I recollect the parliamentary practice, that is in order. At any rate, it is the only thing that is customary.

Now, when the House sends us word that it has appointed conferees and ordered them only to consent to one thing in regard to the particular matter in dispute, which is that the Senate shall give up, it is not inviting us to a free conference any longer on that proposition. It is in substance an order to its conferees to adhere. It seems to me that there is not any proposal, as far as that item is concerned, for a free conference before the Senate. We should either now recede or drop the bill, which, of course, I suppose, is not proposed by anyone.

Suppose this were the only item open in the bill. The House says, "We ask you for a free conference on that measure and we have ordered our conferees not to agree under any circumstances to what you have proposed." A free conference is had in order that they may hear our reasons for what we have done and consider them and see whether we are not right.

It is a good while from the end of the session, and I think this is rather important that we proceed pretty carefully in this matter of conferences with the House; on one hand being careful not to have topics for disagreement or conflict come up if we can help it, but on the other not to yield our just rights and get into a practice which, at the end of a session when we have not much time, is going to take away our own independence and equality.

I think, therefore, the Senator from Wyoming ought to test the sense of the Senate whether we will now retire on that item, and if what the Senator from Maine says be true, and it is undoubtedly true, that where there is such a conflict the body that proposes to do something new must withdraw, we will withdraw with a great deal more dignity now than we can do after another conference. It seems to me that it is an abandonment of our dignity and our equality as one of the coordinate legislative bodies of this Government to go into a conference which is free on one side and where we are padlocked.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to read the parliamentary rule on the subject to which the Senator from Massachusetts has alluded?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I rose for the purpose of suggesting the same thought which has been very much more clearly stated than I could have done by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I will content myself now with simply reading from Jefferson's Manual the rule which has been cited by the Senator from Massachusetts. On page 135 of our Manual, which contains Jefferson's Manual, I find the language which I shall read. After a discussion of the regular order, in which amendments are offered by one House and submitted to the other, etc., it proceeds to say:

> The term of insisting may be repeated as often as they choose to keep the question open, but the first adherence by either renders it necessary for the other to recede or adhere also, when the matter is usually suffered to fall.

In the conclusion of the same paragraph there is the following language:

> Either House, however, is free to pass over the term of insisting and to adhere in the first instance, but it is not respectful to the other. In the ordinary parliamentary course there are two free conferences, at least, before an adherence.

As stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, the instruction of the House to its conferees is practically an adherence, and whether we stand upon the rule of courtesy or not, as to the practice of insistences which may be made before adherence is announced, it does seem to me that when the House has announced that it adheres the Senator from Massachusetts is eminently correct. There is nothing for us to do. There is no reason why we should confer with those who say beforehand they will not agree with us, and who announce that their conferees are not permitted to agree with us for the purpose which we confer. It seems to me there is but one of two things to do, as has been correctly stated by the Senator from Massachusetts—either to recede or to refuse to go further with the matter unless the House will withdraw its adherence.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, all that, of course, the Senate has in mind. It is only a practical question. The House might have voted to adhere, but it did not vote to adhere. That, of course, leaves but one thing for us to do. The House did what has been done more than once in both House and Senate—instead of adhering and making a deadlock, it asked for a new conference, which will bring the matter into another conference if we agree to it, and then instructed—and that is the only opportunity it had in getting at its view of this bill—its conferees not to agree to certain provisions. Of course, we may make the point, and it is a good one, that they ought not to have sent the message which they have sent in connection with their action, but, as I have said, I do not think, as we have called attention to it, that it will ever happen again.

I suppose, however, what will happen is that the Senator in charge of the bill, in whom we have confidence, as we have in the other conferees, will ask for a new conference; that we shall then have a new conference appointed, and we will go into it. Then the conferees will have the opportunity either of receding from this proposition—as it is a proposition that the Senate put on, we moving affirmatively—and thereby end the whole matter and pass the bill, which has some very important things upon it, in which a great many Senators and their constituents are interested, or the conferees will come back to the Senate and ask the Senate to recede; and, as the Senator has indicated that is his desire, I think that is the easiest way out of it.

I do not say that the House was right in sending that message over here with its declaration that it wanted a new conference; but I do not think, to repeat, that that is of importance enough for us to raise an issue and send a special message to the House.

I think this thing will never happen again. I never have known it to happen before, and I have the RECORD here which shows that the Senate has instructed its conferees, after debate and discussion, more than once upon certain matters in a bill, and sent it over to the House, instead of adhering; because, as I have said, adhering at once brings the locking of horns, and one side or the other has got to back down or the whole bill fails. I suppose the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] had that in view and desires the opportunity of again meeting the House conferees, and either agreeing to strike out this provision, as it is new matter put in by the Senate, or coming back and moving here to recede, and let the Senate settle it. I do not feel, of course, that I should make that motion, for I do not want to take the matter out of the hands of the Senator from Wyoming; and, to repeat, to sum up again all these points I recognize as forcible, and if we choose to insist upon them and send such a message back to the House, that can be done, but I do not think it is worth while.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please let me ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. BACON. An agreement to the report of this committee of conference under a notice from the House that it will not recede can only be made upon the express basis of an intention to recede, and that our conferees shall so act. That being the case, why should we go through that formality? Why should not the Senator in charge of the bill move that the Senate recede? If the purpose is to recede, what is the use of appointing another conference committee to go through that formality?

Mr. HALE. It does not follow, of course, that the House may not still recede, although I do not think it will.

Mr. BACON. It can not under the instructions given to its committee of conference.

Mr. HALE. No, I do not think it will; but the conferees have a right to report it to the House for a new result. I do not think it will recede. But the Senator in charge of the bill, instead of making the motion now—I have no objection to his making the motion now—but instead of making that motion now, as he prefers to move to agree to the further conference asked for by the House in order to get the bill back to the conferees, I yield to him in that regard.

Mr. BACON. I understand the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is not one with reference to any desire to retain this provision in the bill, but to preserve the orderly procedure of the Senate. I understand the point made by the Senator to be that it is not consistent with orderly proceedings in the Senate that we should agree to a conference in the face of an avowal by the other House that it will not recede.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand it, the House sends, substantially, this message: "We want you to have a free conference with us, but we will not discuss the question with you." That is the whole of it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not think there is any serious difficulty respecting this motion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. As I understand his motion, it is that we insist not only upon this amendment, which is in dispute——

Mr. HALE. That is part of the motion.

Mr. ALLISON. That is part of the motion—that we insist upon this amendment and all other amendments. As I understand the bill, it consists of a great many items, and the committee of conference at the first meeting agreed to all of these items. The House rejected that conference report; I do not know precisely upon what grounds, but upon various grounds, I presume; perhaps a point of order among other things.

Now, then, this bill is wholly open as to every item in it; and every item that was inserted by the Senate is to be again in conference. The House, after appointing the conferees on the part of the House, instructed them that here was an amendment that they wanted an opportunity to vote on separately. That is the practical question. In appropriation bills it is the common practice of the two Houses, where there is a sharp division between them, to disagree as to certain items and to agree as to all other items. I have had some experience in that regard, as have other Senators. At times here we have disagreed three or four times before we came to a final agreement.

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; four or five times.

Mr. ALLISON. Four or five times. I have the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] in my eye, and he will remember that that occurred here a year ago.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. On the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I believe it was on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; it was on the sundry civil bill as to the item relating to the Charleston Exposition. I recollect very clearly what happened to me that night, or rather what happened to the Charleston Exposition. I was afraid there might be the same thing here on this item.

Mr. ALLISON. I think probably the main object of the House was to bring the bill back again into the House, so as to give the House an opportunity to express its opinion as it had once before done upon this particular amendment of the Senate.

As has been so well stated by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the House of Representatives may have made a mistake in communicating their action to us in the way they have done; but, as I understand it, the main object of the conferees, especially where there are various items in the bill—some of them meritorious, some of them not so meritorious, and some of them where the Senate can finally yield and some of them where the House can finally yield—is by several conferences to get the two Houses together, so that one House or the other will yield items rather than lose all the items in a bill.

So, although there is probably some little irregularity in this proceeding, as the Senator from Maine says, it will never recur. I think if we want to pass this bill, it will be a wise thing for us to agree to the conference asked for by the House. It is not necessary that we should also instruct our conferees that they shall not agree to the bill unless the amendment in dispute is incorporated in it. We can do that if we desire to do so, but I think it is enough for us to say that we insist. We do not go to the extent of insisting upon all the amendments in the bill, including this amendment. The result of the next conference will be, I have no doubt—I do not know, of course, but I suppose—that our conferees will insist upon this particular amendment.

I do not know whether or not they ought to do so; but I suppose it has been put on the bill after careful consideration by the Senate. If they insist upon this amendment in conference, the result will be probably a partial agreement—that is, all the other items will be agreed to, and this particular item will be hung up in the air, as many such items are hung up during the process of passing bills of this character, containing a great number of details. When that is done, our conferees will come back to the Senate, and it will be a question for debate whether we shall still further insist upon this amendment, or whether we shall recede from it; and what happens here will happen in the other House.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, that will happen in the body where the conference report is first submitted, and undoubtedly the motion will be made to recede.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. That motion in regard to the conference report will first be submitted in this Chamber. It may be that the Senator having charge of this bill will not make that motion, but he can make another motion. He can move that upon this particular amendment we still further insist, and then in the next report that goes back to the House it will be for them either to move to recede or move to insist. Then the item will be between the two Houses for further adjustment. So, Mr. President, I quite agree with the suggestion of insisting upon our amendments, agreeing to a further conference, and again try our chances with the other body.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, last evening I was engaged in urgent committee business, and also this morning, and I therefore have not had an opportunity to read in full the proceedings of the House of Representatives yesterday in regard to the omnibus claims bill, but from what I have learned from members of the House, from the remarks of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and the hasty glance I have now been able to give to the RECORD for a few moments, the first complaint lodged against this bill in the House was a point of order that the conference report contained items that had not been passed upon by the House or the Senate before the bill was sent to conference. That charge, unless some explanation is given of it, seems a very severe one. So I think that it is only just to the conferees to state precisely what those items are, and precisely how they came into the report.

A large portion of the omnibus claims bill is made up of findings of facts by the Court of Claims under the so-called Bowman and Tucker claims acts. Another large portion consists of French spoliation claims, which are also Court of Claims findings. The bill that came to us from the House of Representatives had upon it Bowman claims only. The House War Claims Committee report on them was made up of the findings of the Court of Claims set out in full. We added as the Senate amendments the later findings of the court of the same kind, and also certain miscellaneous claims, and the entire matter went into conference.

The Senate conferees did not insert or ask to insert a single new item or to raise the amount of a single item contained in the bill. They were opposed to the insertion of new matter in a conference report as a matter of course. In the meantime, however, at the other end of the Capitol, the House took charge of the bill for a while before it was sent to the conference committee, went into Committee of the Whole on it, and voted almost unanimously to add another one of the Bowman or Tucker court findings, and then proceeded as if to add others. Finally, a motion was made to disagree to the so-called Selfridge board claims, and that motion was carried by a vote of 75 to 73. The committee then rose and reported to the House. Then a motion was made to send the bill to conference.

So, Mr. President, the conferees were in this position when they came to the conference. The House had expressed itself upon inserting another certain claim that had not been covered before either by House or Senate, and the House had also voted in favor of cutting out the Selfridge board claims, but the Speaker of the House had ruled that neither one of those acts stood good, as a matter of fact, because the motion to send to conference carried with it all the subject-matter to the conference.

The conferees on the part of the House asked that we insert the item to which the House had expressed itself as being favorable in Committee of the Whole. They also asked that two other items, court findings, one of about $1,200 and one of about $800, which had already received the indorsement of the House Claims Committee and were supposed at the time the measure passed to be in the bill, should be added, and precedents were quoted for putting them in the bill in conference. I notice that in the House yesterday precedents offered by the House conferees were read on that particular point, so that a general complaint against inserting new matter can scarcely be lodged against the conferees.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, I have read the report very carefully, for I wanted to know all that had taken place. It is not, I think, our Senate conferees who put new matter in the report, against the contention so often raised here that no new matter shall be put into such a report which has not been considered by either House; but it came here in the provision inserted by the other body.

Mr. WARREN. Entirely so.

Mr. HALE. And not from our representatives here.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not want to further occupy the time of the Senate, except to say that the reason I made the motion to insist upon all the Senate amendments and to ask for a further conference and the appointment of conferees was because, whatever the House may do in the future, their action has been, to say the least, a little complicated and confusing upon this subject in the past, and I therefore want the whole matter open to conference. The House asked us to accept, alongside the instructions to cut out the Selfridge board claims, its instruction to insert a certain claim, and yet the same interest making that motion to insert made the complaint yesterday which cut out that identical claim on a point of order, for the purpose, seemingly, of defeating the whole bill.

There was a proposition made in conference that the Selfridge board claims be reduced a certain percentage, as had been done in conference upon similar claims and on a similar bill two years ago. I am not certain but that a proposition of that kind may be submitted as meeting the views of the House. Therefore I have thought it better that the Senate should now at this time insist upon its amendments, ask for a further conference, and go into conference as if this instruction message had not come from the House.

As one of the conferees I want to act in entire harmony with the views of the Senate. I am ready to receive any instructions now or later on, but it seems to me that the better policy at this time would be to go into a "full and free" conference, ignoring entirely the proposition which came over from the House as an instruction appendix to its request for conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] moves that the Senate still further insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and ask for a further conference with the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. WARREN, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. MASON were appointed.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, in accordance with notice heretofore given, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13359) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments first receive consideration. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Fortifications and other works of defense," on page 1, line 9, to increase the appropriation for installation of range and position finders from $325,000 to $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 20, to increase the appropriation for the protection, preservation, and repair of fortifications for which there may be no special appropriation available from $150,000 to $300,000.

For the purchase of submarine mines and necessary appliances to operate them for closing the channels leading to our principal seaports, needful casemates, cable galleries, and so forth, to render it possible to operate submarine mines, and continuing torpedo experiments, $50,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For the construction of mining casemates, cable galleries, torpedo storehouses, cable tanks, and other structures necessary for the operation, preservation, and care of submarine mines and their accessories, $33,000, to be expended by the Engineer Department.

For the purchase of submarine mines and necessary appliances to operate them for closing the channels leading to our principal seaports and continuing torpedo experiments, $17,000, to be expended by the Artillery Corps.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Armament of fortifications," on page 5, line 16, to increase the appropriation for oil-tempered and annealed steel for coast-defense guns of 8-inch, 10-inch, and 12-inch caliber, from $46,500 to $165,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 1, to increase the appropriation for purchase, manufacture, alteration, and issue of carriages for mounting seacoast guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch calibers, including any new tools or machinery necessary for their manufacture at arsenals, from $250,000 to $406,000.

Mr. PROCTOR. Let that amendment be passed over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 7, line 7, to increase the appropriation for range finders, including instruments for fire control and azimuth instruments for coast defense, etc., from $100,000 to $170,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 13, to insert:

For mountain guns, with their carriages, packing outfits, accessories, and ammunition, $82,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 18, before the word "breech-loading," to strike out "five-inch;" so as to make the clause read:

For breech-loading rifles, siege, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 20, before the word "breech-loading," to strike out "five-inch;" so as to make the clause read:

For carriages for breech-loading rifles, siege, including implements, equipments, platforms, and ammunition wagons, $14,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 23, before the word "breech-loading," to strike out "seven-inch;" so as to make the clause read:

For breech-loading howitzers, siege, $8,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 1, before the word "breech-loading," to strike out "seven-inch;" so as to make the clause read:

For carriages for breech-loading howitzers, siege, including implements, equipments, platforms, and ammunition wagons, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 12, to insert:

For remaining payments to be made under contract with the Bethlehem Iron Company dated June 8, 1898, as amended by supplemental contract of June 22, 1901, $35,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary. This payment shall be made to the Bethlehem Steel Company as successor to the Bethlehem Iron Company.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to offer as a substitute for the committee amendment an amendment which I ask to have read. I will ask the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] to accept the amendment tentatively and provisionally, subject to the approval of the War Department, which, I understand, has been given to the amendment. Its purpose is the same, but it is somewhat broader in scope.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the committee amendment and insert the following:

All contracts of the Bethlehem Iron Company, of South Bethlehem, Pa., heretofore made between it and the United States shall be completed by its successor, the Bethlehem Steel Company, or its successor, which has acquired or may acquire all of its assets and has assumed or may assume all of its liabilities under the said contracts, and the said Bethlehem Steel Company, or its lawful successor, upon giving security in proper form and amount conditioned upon the performance by it of the said contracts according to the true intent and meaning thereof, shall be substituted therein for the said Bethlehem Iron Company, and be entitled to exercise all rights thereunder which the said Bethlehem Iron Company had or would have had if it had continued in existence.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania somewhat enlarges the recommendation made by the Secretary of War, which was presented to your committee. However, there seems to be no objection to it on its face. I will, therefore, with the permission of the committee, accept it provisionally; that is, that a letter of recommendation shall be secured from the Secretary of War substituting this for his former recommendation.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand this amendment has the indorsement of Major McNally. It was only given to me this morning, so that I have not had an opportunity to get the formal recommendation of the Secretary of War or of the Chief of Ordnance. Of course, that will be had or I will not press the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 8, after line 19, to insert:

The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to accept the proposition of the Pneumatic Gun Carriage and Power Company contained in its letter of August 9, 1901, addressed to the president of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, for settlement of its contract dated November 5, 1894, to furnish the Department with a 10-inch disappearing gun carriage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Proving Ground, Sandy Hook, N. J.," on page 9, line 12, to increase the appropriation for current expenses and maintenance of the ordnance proving ground, Sandy Hook, N. J., from $37,000 to $43,926.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 18, after the word "draftsmen," to insert "and such other service as the Secretary of War may deem necessary;" so as to make the clause read:

For the necessary expenses of officers while temporarily employed on ordnance duties at the proving ground and absent from their proper stations, at the rate of $2.50 per diem while so employed, and the compensation of draftsmen and such other service as the Secretary of War may deem necessary while employed in the Army Ordnance Bureau on ordnance construction, $18,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, after line 19, to insert:

SEA WALL AT SANDY HOOK, NEW JERSEY.

For construction of a riprap or stone wall and causeway for the protection of the eastern beach of the United States lands at Sandy Hook, New Jersey, and the Government railroad thereon, $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 11, to insert:

FRANKFORD ARSENAL, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

For establishment of a power plant for the artillery ammunition factory, and the removal thereto of engines and boilers on hand, $58,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 4, to insert:

For box-making and packing shop for small-arms cartridge factory, $28,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Watertown Arsenal, Watertown, Mass.," on page 11, after line 12, to insert:

For additional battery of two boilers, including extension of the boiler room, and necessary connections, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Board of Ordnance and Fortification," on page 13, after line 10, to strike out the remainder of the bill in the following words:

To enable the Government to secure the use of the high explosive "Thorite," the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to purchase the entire and exclusive right for the United States to manufacture and use the high explosive "Thorite:" Provided, That all formulæ, data, and facts related to said process and necessary to the successful manufacture of said "Thorite" shall be placed in the possession of the Secretary of War before payment for the same shall be made.

The sum of $50,000 for the said purpose is directed to be taken from the appropriation of $100,000 made by the act of Congress "Making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense," approved March 1, 1901, for the purpose of securing the high explosive "Thorite" and the "Isham High Explosive Shell."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment on page 6 was passed over.

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] asked to have that temporarily go over. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I offer an amendment which I think might come in either on page 2, after line 20, or at the end of the bill. I am not particular as to where it comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 20, insert the following:

There is hereby granted to the State of Connecticut the right to occupy, improve, and control, for the purposes of a public park for the use and benefit of citizens of the United States and for no other purposes whatever, the tract of land owned by the United States which is situated on the east shore of New London Harbor, in said State of Connecticut, known as the Fort Griswold tract, and partly occupied by an abandoned fort and earthwork of that name, said tract being bounded northerly by the Fort Griswold monument reservation and by the land of various private parties, easterly and southerly by the land of various private parties, and westerly by New London Harbor and by the land of various private parties. The provisions of this grant are that the State of Connecticut shall have and exercise power to make and enforce police regulations concerning said tract and shall protect it from injury and defacement; that before beginning any use or improvement of said tract the State of Connecticut shall present to the Secretary of War detailed plans of any improvement and shall have received his approval thereof; that the United States reserves to itself the fee in said tract and the right to resume possession and occupy any portion thereof whenever, in the judgment of the President, the exigency arises that should require the use and appropriation of the same for the public defense or otherwise, without any claim for compensation to the State of Connecticut for improvements which may have been made thereon or damages on account thereof.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I gave notice of this amendment. I ought to have appeared before the subcommittee to explain it, but I was away. I think there is no objection to it. I will ask to have read the memorandum of the Chief of Engineers in connection with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
April 17, 1902.

Respectfully returned to the Secretary of War.

The suggested amendment to the fortification bill provides all necessary safeguards for the interests of the United States in Fort Griswold so far as engineer features are concerned. No objection is made on the part of the Chief of Engineers to its incorporation in the bill.

A blue print which shows the Fort Griswold tract is sent herewith. From this it will be seen that the fort tract is bounded westerly by land of various private parties and New London Harbor and not by New London Harbor and a public highway, as stated in the draft of suggested amendment.

G. L. GILLESPIE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The boundary has been corrected in the present amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted at the end of line 2, page 6:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this act shall be used for constructing or procuring disappearing carriages, emplacements, or magazines therefor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont offers the amendment which the Secretary will read.

Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this act shall be used for constructing or procuring disappearing carriages, emplacements, or magazines therefor.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I regret very much that I was not able to go before the committee on this measure, but other engagements prevented it, and the information that I had asked for by a resolution was not furnished in time; in fact, the principal response only came in last night, and I have had no opportunity to examine it. But I felt that I should be remiss in my duty if I did not express, on the passage of this bill, my views about the disappearing carriage.

The history of it in brief is this: In 1896 letters patent were granted to Colonel Buffington and Captain Crozier (he was then) for a disappearing carriage. General Crozier, in a communication sent to the Military Committee by the Secretary of War, stated that no royalty had been paid by this Government, which is true, but they had disposed of the patents in foreign governments to the Bethlehem Iron Company, which is now the Bethlehem Steel Company—they are the same corporation, only the name has been changed—for a stated sum paid down and for a royalty reserved on all that was sold in foreign countries. The amount of this sum paid down was not stated, and I do not know that it makes any difference. Rumor has put it at a high sum, but one of his friends has told me that it was $10,000, equally divided between Colonels Crozier and Buffington.

Colonel Crozier stated before the House Committee on Appropriations that something over a year ago inquiries were sent out as to the views of artillery officers in regard to these carriages. To these inquiries 91 replies were received, and of the 91 officers replying 84 expressed opinions and 7 asked to be excused from expressing an opinion.

Of the 84 who expressed opinions, 60 were in favor of the use of the disappearing carriage which had been provided for the sites on which it was originally intended to use it—namely, medium and low sites; and of these 60, 16 were in favor of the exclusive use of the disappearing carriages on all sites. Sixty-three out of the 84 would have been a three-quarter majority, and those who were in favor were 60 out of 84.

Those replies are printed in Senate Document No. 336, which any Senator can obtain, and I should be very glad if they would do so. And there is also another document brought in this morning, No. 355. Those documents will give all that information.

I have read every one of those letters very carefully and have made many notes upon them. The best I could make out is that a very large majority even of the 60—two-thirds of them—are not in favor of the carriage. Considering the matter from the standpoint on which we must consider it—that is, granting that what they say is true—is it a wise and safe investment of money to make more of these carriages? I think Senators will be convinced that the evidence is overwhelming that, looking at these letters from our standpoint of the case, from the duty that is before us, a large majority of the replies are opposed to the use of the carriage. Many of them are very strong against its use under any consideration.

In Document 336 the Secretary of War sends some preliminary articles. I do not need to read them. It is an expression from a report made in 1891. There was another one made in 1894, before this carriage was patented, and there is a report from Secretary of War Lamont in 1894. It is fair to say that when the great improvements in heavy ordnance were made by high-explosive powder and lengthening of the gun it seemed to be the theory to construct a carriage that after the discharge would disappear and would be entirely out of the way, and all the men serving it would be protected; and there was a good deal of work done in all countries of the world in that direction.

This patent was gotten out here. General Buffington was, as you know, Chief of Ordnance. The Ordnance Department had almost absolute control of this matter of expenditures. The Board of Ordnance and Fortification, which was established in 1888 with a view to make an independent board which should consider matters of this kind, has been stripped of all its power. It practically amounts to nothing now. The original act contemplated that all the expenditures should be made on the recommendation of that board. It was proposed originally in the Senate here as an amendment to the fortifications bill.

I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will remember about it. I find, in looking up the records, he had considerable to say about it. The purpose of it was to give to outside inventors a better opportunity to have an impartial board of high character to pass upon these things instead of having them in the close corporation, as I am inclined to call it, of the Ordnance Bureau.

Among the other preliminary papers is a report from that board, the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, made in 1900. They report against the use of this carriage in the first place for rapid-fire guns, and then say:

> After giving the question of nondisappearing and disappearing carriages for 8, 10, 12, and 16 inch high-power guns for coast fortifications and the opinions of artillery officers careful consideration, it is the judgment of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification that it would be unwise and injudicious to locate any more guns on disappearing carriages than those now under process of construction on high or medium sites and no more should be placed (than those now under process of construction) on low sites until the proportion of those to be placed in such fortifications shall have been limited to one-third of the total number to be so located.

The vote on this resolution was in favor of it. General Miles, Colonel Rodgers, one of the finest officers of artillery, and General Henderson, well known to members of the Senate, a long time a member of the House, the civilian member of the board, voted for it. The two who were opposed to it were General Wilson and General Buffington, one of the patentees.

The questions asked of these artillery officers are found on page 6, of Document No. 336.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. If it will not interrupt the Senator from Vermont, would it not be well to give the reports which have been made on this subject by other Boards of Ordnance and Fortification than the one he has referred to?

Mr. WARREN. Upon which General Buffington did not serve.

Mr. HARRIS. The preceding board. I think there were several reports at different times, and I think it is just as well to have them.

Mr. PROCTOR. Those that are printed in this document?

Mr. HARRIS. They are printed in Senate Document No. 336.

Mr. PROCTOR. Please refer to them. I have referred to some board reports.

Mr. WARREN. They immediately precede what you have read.

Mr. PROCTOR. Oh, yes; I thought I explained that sufficiently. In 1894 there was a favorable report, and there was a report in 1897.

Mr. WARREN. There was a report in 1891.

Mr. PROCTOR. I sufficiently explained those other reports. At that time it was the desire of everybody to get such a carriage if possible.

Mr. HARRIS. If we are to discuss the question of the gun carriage and its desirability, it seems to me all of the matter on pages 3, 4, and 5 of Senate Document No. 336 would be very desirable.

Mr. PROCTOR. I would be very glad indeed to have it read. I do not wish to read it myself. I cheerfully admit there are several reports. If that is not sufficient, let them be read.

Mr. HARRIS. A reference to it will be sufficient.

Mr. PROCTOR. The answers to the inquiries follow. The questions asked were, "What opportunities have you had to judge?" "Which do you deem preferable for modern high-power guns, barbette carriages or disappearing carriages, either on high, medium, or low sites?" "Your opinion of disappearing carriages, and whether they are satisfactory or unsatisfactory; if unsatisfactory, state the reasons, etc."

All those questions are found at the top of page 6.

The answers are quite lengthy, and I ask to have printed an abstract or a synopsis made by an artillery officer, the recorder, I think he is, or was, of the Board of Ordnance. It was asked for by the Secretary of War and made for him. That is Document 355.

I have not been able to compare the abstract fully. I presume it is a fair one. I have had printed the page of Document No. 336 where the full letter is given, and Senators can look at the abstract and compare it with the letter if they choose to do so. I have had them printed in this order.

On page 94 of Document No. 336 is given a summary from a digest of opinions of these officers. The first class, those claimed to favor disappearing carriages for heavy guns on all sites are 15 officers; those claimed to favor disappearing and nondisappearing carriages, depending on height of site, are 49 officers. Then follows a list of 8 who are in favor of nondisappearing carriages without shields on all sites; a list of 10 in favor of nondisappearing carriages with shields on all sites; then two other lists, the final one, 6, giving no definite expression of opinion.

This synopsis is printed in just the order they are named there. The first fifteen are those who are claimed to be, without qualification, in favor of the disappearing carriage. I will ask the Secretary to read that list, and, if he will, to read it slowly, and give the name of the officer and page on the summary where his letter can be found in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont want the entire document read that he has sent to the Secretary's desk?

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I think it will be only fair, when we are to have a list of answers, to first have the questions read, so that the Senators who hear these answers may know what was propounded to the witness.

Mr. PROCTOR. I read the substance of the questions.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator did not read them completely.

Mr. PROCTOR. I read the substance of every one of them.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator does not object, I will ask to have them read.

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the first page, commencing 1, 2, a, b, c, and 3, 4, and 5, be read.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the whole of it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Wyoming read the document, or will he send it to the Secretary's desk to be read?

Mr. WARREN. I will send it to the Secretary, as he is to read all the others.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will state that the questions are to be found on the top of page 6.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 2, 1902.

SIR: In response to the following resolution of the Senate, dated April 24, 1902—

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of all official reports from artillery officers in regard to the Buffington-Crozier disappearing gun carriage, made either to the War Department or to the Board of Ordnance and Fortification"—

I have the honor to advise you that on July 19, 1900, letters were addressed by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification to officers of artillery who had been in charge of batteries of modern high-power guns within the past two years, requesting replies to the following questions:

"(1) Please state what opportunities you have had for judging as to the value, effectiveness, and utility of disappearing and nondisappearing gun carriages.

"(2) Which do you deem preferable for modern high-power guns in barbette batteries, either on high, medium, or low sites:

"(a) Disappearing carriages such as are now in use;

"(b) A nondisappearing carriage such as is now in use;

"(c) A nondisappearing carriage with a strong shield for the protection of the gunners;

"Assuming all to be provided with proper loading facilities?

"(3) In your judgment are the disappearing carriages now mounted in modern batteries satisfactory or unsatisfactory?

"(4) If unsatisfactory, please state in as concise a manner as practicable to what extent you deem them objectionable, and what changes or improvements can you suggest?

"(5) Any suggestions as to the proportion in which these different types of carriages should be used, or any other suggestions you may desire to make in this connection, will be considered by the board."

Replies to these questions were received from 91 officers.

Copies of all these replies are annexed hereto.

A digest of the opinions contained in the replies prepared for the Secretary of War by Gen. John M. Wilson, then Chief of Engineers, is also annexed, together with a summary prepared from that digest, whereby it appears that of the 91 artillery officers answering the questions, 64 were in favor of disappearing carriages, 15 being in favor of them for all sites, 49 being in favor of them for low sites and of nondisappearing carriages for high sites, while 21 were opposed to disappearing carriages on any site, and 6 gave no definite expression of opinion.

The only official reports in regard to the Buffington-Crozier disappearing gun carriage made to the War Department, as distinct from the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, are a report by First Lieut. (now Capt.) H. E. Cloke, Third Artillery, commanding defenses at the mouth of the Columbia, dated December 15, 1900, and a report by Maj. Charles E. L. B. Davis, Corps of Engineers, dated December 19, 1900. Both of these reports relate to firing tests of the disappearing gun carriage made on the Pacific coast in the fall of 1900, and both of them are annexed herejo.

Under paragraph 415 of Army Regulations the commanding officers of all artillery stations are required to forward to the War Department a report of each shot fired in practice, instruction, and active service.

I do not understand that it was the intent of the resolution to call forth these reports, but as portions of them have a manifest bearing upon the subject I inclose a digest of the statements contained in these reports for the second half of the year 1900 and the whole of the year 1901, relating to the action of disappearing gun carriages. The reports themselves are very detailed and voluminous. Complete copies will be prepared and furnished if the Senate should so desire.

The remarks as to the action of gun and carriage quoted in the ninth column of the digest exhibit a general record of efficiency, such failures to act perfectly, as are recorded in about one-fourth of the cases, being but slight and easily corrected, and of the character which it is the purpose of practice to correct.

There are also on file in the Department copies of voluntary letters stating the personal experience of the writers in the use of the Buffington-Crozier disappearing gun carriages, as follows:

By Maj. Arthur Murray, Corps of Artillery, dated December 26, 1899; by Maj. W. P. Duvall, Corps of Artillery, dated July 15, 1900; by Maj. Sedgwick Pratt, Corps of Artillery, dated January 11, 1901.

These letters having the substantial character, although not the technical form, of reports, I also annex hereto.

I also annex, as furnishing useful information upon the subject of the resolution, extracts from the reports of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, showing the action of that body on the subject of disappearing gun carriages from the date of its organization to the present time, and an extract from the annual report of Secretary Lamont in 1894 upon the same subject.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
United States Senate.

Mr. PROCTOR. Now let the synopsis be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Senate Document No. 355, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

DISAPPEARING GUN CARRIAGES—SYNOPSIS OF REPORTS FROM ARTILLERY OFFICERS ON SUBJECT OF DISAPPEARING GUN CARRIAGES PRINTED IN SENATE DOCUMENT NO. 336, FIFTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

May 13, 1902.—Ordered to be printed.

The following is a synopsis of the reports of the 15 officers named in the summary on page 24 of Senate Document No. 336 as favoring disappearing carriages for heavy guns for all sites:

Captain Best (p. 72): Can not say as to carriage in general; thinks present carriage gives better protection than barbette, particularly so on low sites; thinks present carriage satisfactory, but defenses not effective because of insufficient artillery; can not see why such carriages can not be kept in order; present difficulty lies with the animate artillery; has not been associated with the armament for past two years and has consequently lost touch to a considerable extent; knows of no reason to think unfavorably of present carriage.

Captain Chase (p. 77): Inclines toward disappearing carriages for guns of 10 and 12 inch caliber; opinion not formed as to barbette carriages with and without shield; when present carriage is properly installed, it is easy and simple to operate; demands constant care; from experience, thinks they fulfill the requirements of seacoast sites.

Captain Cronkhite (p. 78): In favor of for all sites, but not for rapid-fire guns; present carriage satisfactory if used under conditions upon which their construction is based.

Lieutenant Ferguson (p. 89): Favors for all sites; regards present carriage satisfactory and as efficient as barbette carriage; has served during the past two and one-half years in light battery, and consequently opinion not maturely formed.

Capt. H. L. Harris (p. 50): Favors latest model for all sites; no suggestions to offer; present carriage satisfactory; experience very limited.

Lieutenant Hains (p. 47): Prefers disappearing carriage, particularly for low and medium heights, because it affords greater protection for the gun and detachment; qualifies this opinion in special cases; experience too limited to form competent judgment as to whether present carriage is satisfactory or not; thinks they are.

Lieutenant Hero (p. 53): In favor of for all guns of 8, 10, and 12 inch caliber.

Captain Hoyle (p. 56): In favor of for all sites; present carriage entirely satisfactorr; work beautifully, and are a happy solution of a difficult problem. Suggests an actual firing test to determine service value.

Lieutenant Johnston (p. 42): In favor of for all sites for all except rapid-fire guns; late models of present carriage satisfactory, and with proper care ought to do good service, but thinks they can be improved upon in simplicity of construction, in reduction of cost, in making them suitable for use either as disappearing or nondisappearing carriages; objects to sliding surfaces and the present method of taking up recoil.

Colonel Kinzie (p. 43): In favor of for all sites; present carriage of later model seems to be satisfactory; no suggestions and no recommendations.

Lieutenant McNair (p. 18): In favor of the disappearing carriage for all sites; considers the latest model of disappearing carriage to be very satisfactory; believes that no radical changes are needed in the disappearing carriage as now made for the 12-inch rifle; objects to shields; describes advantages of disappearing carriage over barbette.

Colonel Myrick (p. 22): In favor of for all sites: present carriage satisfactory or, when not, believes it can be made so by a perfect acquaintance on the part of the men engaged in handling it.

Captain Pratt (p. 10): In favor of for all sites; considers present carriage of later models satisfactory, with exception of traverse chains and retraction gears; criticises the loading crane.

Captain Weaver (p. 30): States that if mechanical defects can be removed so as to make the carriage certain, he would favor disappearing; favors disappearing for large calibers; points out many defects constantly developing. Recommends that board of civilian mechanical experts be formed to report on carriage.

Lieutenant Winston (p. 40): Theory of disappearing carriage is correct, in his opinion, and protection afforded is sufficient to warrant its manufacture in preference to simpler barbette; qualifies this opinion by referring to delicate machinery; states that if it fulfills conditions laid down, disappearing carriage is best for 8, 10, and 12 inch guns.

Mr. PROCTOR. These are the 15 men who are quoted as unqualifiedly in favor of the disappearing carriage. I wish to call attention to the fact that four of them said that they have had practically no experience. The first one, Captain Best, "has not been associated with the armament for the past two years, and has consequently lost touch with it to a considerable extent;" Lieutenant Ferguson says his "opinion not maturely formed;" Captain Harris says, "experience very limited;" Lieutenant Hains says, "experience too limited to form competent judgment as to whether present carriage is satisfactory or not;" and five qualify their indorsement to such an extent as would hardly justify action upon an appropriation.

Captain Hoyle "suggests an actual firing test to determine service value," which has never been given, so far as I can learn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator mean that there never has been a firing test with full charge?

Mr. PROCTOR. I beg the Senator's pardon; I will come later on to a table showing just what has been done.

Captain Weaver "recommends that board of civilian mechanical experts be formed to report on carriage," which I think is a very wise recommendation.

Let the Secretary proceed with the reading. The next 49 are quoted as favorable, depending somewhat on the site. Perhaps I might say that the engineers classify the sites in this way from their table, which I examined. Up to 40 feet is a low site. They make a division, 40 to 60, and 60 to 80, which are both perhaps called medium, the first a low medium and the next a high medium. Above 80 is a high site.

The Secretary read as follows:

The following 49 are named as favoring disappearing and nondisappearing carriages, depending on height of site:

Captain Adams (p. 92): Opposed to for sites above 75 feet; in favor of below this height. Present carriage not entirely satisfactory; presumes defects will be remedied; states that chains frequently break at drill, due to defective design; believes this can be remedied: adjustment of counterweight causes trouble; requires constant care and precaution to keep adjusted. Gives his experience at Morro Castle during Spanish war. States Navy did no damage to coast defenses above elevation of 70 feet.

Captain Alexander (p. 68): Opposed to carriage; present carriage not completely satisfactory; too liable to get out of order; requires constant care; too complicated; retraction gear with ropes and chain constantly giving trouble; loading devices slow and unwieldy. As carriage has not been subjected to test of war would try both types and mount half the guns on low sites on disappearing carriages.

Lieutenant Arnold (p. 69): Opposed to on high and medium sites; favors on low sites; carriage only partially satisfactory; recoil mechanism and counterweight defective; cylinders give trouble; carriages can not be tested before firing; too slow; great difficulty experienced in keeping bearing surfaces clean; suggests that such carriages be used only in case others can not be.

Captain Bailey (p. 70): Opposed to generally; a few could be used on very low sites defending a very narrow channel; for calibers of 8 inches and over, carriages used on low sites and in certain special cases on medium sites. Present carriage will be satisfactory when improvements are made. Recommends no more such carriages for rapid-fire guns.

Captain Bartlett (p. 71): Opposed to on high and medium sites; would use one half on low sites; present carriage unsatisfactory to some degree; not simple in construction; gets out of order easily; adjustments too fine; slow fire.

Captain Blunt (p. 73): Opposed to on high; in favor of on medium and low, but modifies his favorable opinion by certain conditions; considers latest type of carriage satisfactory; carriages are changing continually; suggests certain improvements in mechanism; points out defects; cylinders give trouble; so do counterweights; older models of carriages defective; retraction chains break often; laying devices not satisfactory; gun sights not placed properly. Further use will bring out advantages and disadvantages of these types.

Major Burbank (p. 74): Opposed to on high and medium sites; in favor of on low sites; opinion based on theoretical grounds; present carriage complicated; requires a skilled personnel, which at present we do not have; has only had experience with present type and does not feel qualified to discuss relative proportions.

Lieutenant Campbell (p. 75): Opposed to for high sites; in favor of for medium and low; present carriage very satisfactory; present liability of injury to mechanism can be remedied; suggests certain improvements; smokeless powder should be used.

Lieutenant Chamberlain (p. 76): Opposed to on high sites; in favor of on low sites; no fixed rule as to medium sites; present carriage satisfactory; suggests various improvements and points out defects; power should be used for manipulation; no suggestions as to proportions of types of different carriages.

Captain Conklin (p. 78): On general principles opposed to on high and medium sites and in favor of for low sites; says present carriages fairly satisfactory; experience limited; not sufficient data to base an opinion upon; would only favor disappearing carriages on low sites, provided it stands the test of firing under severest conditions; otherwise would favor the barbette; reports on the whole against the carriage, even for low sites.

Capt. R. H. Davis (p. 80): Opposed to on high and medium sites; in favor of on low; carriage satisfactory except as to minor details and loading facilities; suggests application of power; recommends practical trial to determine relative value under service conditions to settle questions.

Major Day (p. 8.): Opposed to on all sites, but favors use of small; proportion to be determined in each case by board of officers, majority of whom should be artillerymen. Thinks present carriage unsatisfactory; mechanism too delicate; too liable to get out of order; objections serious; favors a mixed mount for heavy artillery, proportion to be determined in each case separately, as above indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering the pending bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate be permitted to continue the consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will resume the reading.

The Secretary read as follows:

Lieutenant Gatchell (p. 90): Opposed to on high and medium sites; in favor of on certain special low sites, but even for low sites would prefer Gruson turrets; present carriage not wholly satisfactory; points out many minor defects in the mechanism; suggests no improvement.

Lieutenant Gatley (p. 91): Thinks question can not be consistently answered as stated, as all depends on the site; for sites under 200 feet suggests the present disappearing carriage until a better one is devised; so far as his personal experience and observation goes, present carriage eminently satisfactory. Believes that the effectiveness of the carriages depends altogether upon the men in charge of them. Believes that the ordnance officer should be a man of experience and mechanical ingenuity.

Captain Hamilton (p. 64): Opposed to on high and medium sites; in favor of for low sites; present carriages not entirely satisfactory; states many objections to details of mechanism. Suggests as a solution of the question that such carriages be used only for sites under 70 feet.

Captain Harlow (p. 48): Opposed to for all sites; present carriage unsatisfactory; gives in detail objections, but thinks that for very low sites and for short ranges a proportion of disappearing carriages may be used, proportion not to exceed one-half, usually less.

Lieut. F. E. Harris (p. 49): Opposed to for high and medium sites; for low sites favors the use of either type; present carriage not satisfactory; were constantly out of order and no amount of care seemed able to prevent the difficulties encountered. Makes no suggestions.

Colonel Hasbrouck (p. 50): Opposed to for medium and high sites; in favor of for low sites; considers present carriage satisfactory for its type, but prefers the barbette carriage where it can be used without too much exposure to the enemy's fire; has seen both carriages tested by firing, during which defects developed with the disappearing but not with the nondisappearing; proportion should be determined by the site.

Lieutenant Hayden (p. 52): In favor of for low and medium; opposed to for high sites; qualifies opinion as to medium sites; present carriage satisfactory in almost every respect when given proper care and attention; defects of earlier models have been corrected.

Captain Hills (p. 53): Opposed to for high and medium sites; in favor of for low; no suggestions or recommendations.

Lieutenant Hubbard (p. 57): Opposed to for high and medium sites; in favor of for low sites in special situations, and especially where the element of surprise enters; the later models of the present carriage appear to be satisfactory; present proportion of these carriages entirely too great; 30 or, at most, 40 per cent would appear to be high enough.

Lieutenant Kephart (p. 85): Objects to on all sites; present carriage unsatisfactory; gives in detail advantages and disadvantages of the two types; would suggest certain improvements in the artillery service of the guns.

Captain Lomia (p. 44): In favor of for low sites; opposed to for high sites; present carriage unsatisfactory; objection to carriage its liability to get out of order, thus rendering gun useless; qualifies opinion as to low sites, and would use nondisappearing carriages with shield for protection of gun detachment on such sites.

Captain Lundeen (p. 89): Opposed to for high and medium sites; no opinion as to low sites; does not think present carriage entirely satisfactory, and gives an illustration from his own experience, describing faults in detail.

Captain Marsh (p. 15): In favor of for all except very high sites for guns of 10-inch caliber and upward; has never seen the nondisappearing carriage, either with or without shield, and only four of the disappearing carriages, and has never seen these tested in service; consequently not qualified to answer the question submitted.

Lieutenant Martin (p. 20): Opposed to for high and medium sites; in favor of for low and medium sites, unless a more simple carriage can be constructed; present carriages of late model satisfactory, but thinks they may not be the best attainable; seem to be most satisfactory part of our system of coast defenses; well-trained men required to handle them; none but artillery officers should be allowed to mount and dismount these guns.

Captain McClellan (p. 17): In favor of for low sites; opposed to for high sites, and would use both on medium sites; regards the present carriage as satisfactory; believes that the faults found can be cured and presumes they will be; criticises various details of the mechanism; proportion of types must depend upon exposure to enemy's fire.

Captain Newcomb (p. 23): Opposed to for high and medium sites; in favor of for medium sites provided a simpler type can be devised; carriage fairly satisfactory; considers the carriage as a whole experimental.

Captain Patterson (p. 24): Has had but little experience; prefers a barbette carriage with shield; does not consider present carriage satisfactory, but believes they can be made to work better; has no suggestions as to proportions, but thinks majority of disappearing carriages in low sites; suggests improvement in service of magazines.

Lieutenant Pence (p. 24): Opposed to for high and medium sites; favors a small proportion for low sites in certain special cases; does not consider the carriage as now mounted satisfactory; gives reasons.

Colonel Randolph (p. 87): Difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to value of these carriages in actual warfare; his preference is decidedly in favor of barbette carriage with shield, which makes a better target; suggests it may be well to have a certain proportion of disappearing carriages on low sites; has little or nothing on which to base an opinion.

Captain Ridgway (p. 66): Opposed to for all sites; considers present carriage unsatisfactory; his experience fails to approve them as reliable machines and their efficiency depends upon too many adjustments; if a satisfactory solution of the problem of a reliable disappearing carriage is found, a number could be advantageously applied to sites up to about 60 feet.

Colonel Rodgers (p. 86): Opposed to for high and medium sites, and also for low sites, unless a perfectly stable foundation can be constructed on such sites; considers present carriage unsatifactory and gives in detail his reasons. On low sites would not mount more than 50 per cent of 8, 10, and 12 inch guns on disappearing carriages.

Captain Rogers (p. 6): Not had sufficient experience and not prepared to give an expert opinion. If guns are mounted on disappearing carriages they should at least be supplemented by others mounted on barbette with shield.

Captain Rumbough (p. 10): Opposed to on high and medium sites; considers them satisfactory for low sites; has not used carriage sufficiently to learn its defects.

Captain Skerrett (p. 11): Opposed to on high and medium sites; favors on low sites only; considers present carriage very satisfactory as a type of its class; objection is to type for general use, and suggests improvements.

Lieutenant Snow (p. 12): Opposed to for high and medium sites; in favor of for low sites; considers present carriage on whole satisfactory; requires more intelligent and better trained class of soldiers; danger that something will be deranged during actual fire that would require the services of more skilled men than are now found in the artillery; thinks the present carriage has no equal of its type, but that a sufficient proportion of them has already been mounted and that hereafter the standard carriage should be barbette.

Captain Stone (p. 14): Opposed to for high and medium sites; in favor of for low sites; prefers that the number of disappearing carriages be limited to such as may be calculated for final resistance at close range in case others become disabled.

Maj. R. P. Strong (p. 9): Opposed to on high and medium sites; on low sites would use both; present carriage not entirely satisfactory; gun can not always be depended upon to run into battery; recommends that on low sites half the guns be disappearing and half barbette.

Capt. F. S. Strong (p. 15): In favor of on sites below 40 or 50 feet; for high and medium sites, opposed to; considers the present carriage more liable to get out of adjustment than the barbette, and does not consider them entirely satisfactory; suggests no improvements or changes; says that the disappearing carriage is practically used only for a few shots during actual firing season; officers and men do not become familiar with it.

Lieutenant Todd (p. 59): Opposed to for high and medium sites; favors for low sites; considers latest models best obtainable, but use for all sites can not be too strongly condemned; mechanism complicated; loading facilities crude and slow.

Captain Townsley (p. 60): In favor of for low and medium sites except for rapid-fire guns; opposed to for high sites; advantage of carriage is in protection; does not consider them entirely satisfactory, but considers defects are of mechanical details and not inherent; cylinders defective; platform not rigid; thinks difficulties due to lack of sufficient firing practice.

Captain Treat (p. 9): Opposed to for all sites, but suggests that a few disappearing carriages would be of advantage on certain sites; not satisfactory as only one to use, but is satisfactory of its type.

Captain Van Deusen (p. 94): Prefers a large proportion of barbette carriages with shields; considers present carriage satisfactory of their class, but does not think so much dependence should be placed on them; carriage is complicated; constant care needed; easily put out of order; thinks system of protection has bad effect on efficiency of gun. Does not think proportion of disappearing should be greater than one-third.

Captain Van Ness (p. 25): Mistake to rely entirely on disappearing carriages; experience with partially instructed volunteer artillery sufficient to indicate need of carriage of simple construction; prefers barbette, but disappearing carriage will be best for certain sites; his objection is solely to amount of mechanism.

Captain Walker (p. 81): So far as his experience goes is disposed to favor present carriage, but on account of cost favors barbette with shield for protection of gunners on high sites; considers carriage quite satisfactory; as a machine, complicated and liable to get out of order.

Captain Whistler (p. 28): Considers present carriage complicated; large number of sliding parts, and must necessarily become, in time, very inaccurate, and more so than barbette; considers it fundamental that disappearing carriage should not be used when barbette can be; use of disappearing carriage as service type for all sites contrary to common sense; loading facilities not satisfactory; present carriage meets all requirements of fire so far as gun is concerned, but is too complicated. Thinks Howell carriage better than Crozier-Buffington.

Captain White (p. 30): No practical experience with barbette carriage and has not formed definite opinion as to merits of two; both should be used in varying proportions on medium and low sites; opposed to them for high sites; present carriage not entirely satisfactory; gun fails to run fully into firing position at times and at others goes in with too much shock; does not think it advisable to manufacture any more disappearing carriages until fair proportion of nondisappearing have been obtained and their relative merits tried.

Captain Wisser (p. 41): Opposed to for high sites; favors one-fifth for medium sites and one-third for low sites; considers the carriage satisfactory; only grave objection to it is lack of proper loading facilities.

The following 10 officers are named as favoring nondisappearing carriages with shields for all sites:

Captain Anderson (p. 68): Opposed to for all sites; present carriage unsatisfactory; not accurate; aiming defective; does not permit rapid firing; states his opinion that one-half the carriages now mounted will be giving trouble half an hour after action begins; easily disabled; spring return barbette carriage suggested instead.

Lieutenant Barrette (p. 70): Opposed to on all sites; carriage unsatisfactory under present conditions; objectionable so long as artillery force is insufficient, badly organized, and meanly paid; mechanism beautiful but delicate; skilled personnel needed to keep in order.

Captain Califf (p. 75): Opposed to for all guns and on all sites; present carriage appears to behave well under the conditions of drill and exercise; objects to it because of the ease and ever-imminent possibility of its being disabled under actual conditions of war.

Captain Hoskins (p. 55): Opposed to for all sites; present carriage unsatisfactory; gives objections in detail; recommends many minor changes in mechanism.

Lieutenant Hunter (p. 65): Opposed to for all sites except that it may be preferable to mount the 8-inch rifle on disappearing carriages on low sites; says loading facilities of barbette carriage not satisfactory; present carriage not satisfactory except for the 8-inch rifle; those for the 12-inch rifle are most unsatisfactory; states that since last November there has been two weeks when all the disappearing carriages could have been used; at the present time the three 10-inch carriages are out of order, and have been since June; points out defects; constantly out of order; hard to clean, and less accurate than barbette; states that within two years it will be necessary to dismount each of the 12-inch B. L. rifles at Fort Mott; gives reasons; makes no recommendations; suggests more attention in keeping clean.

Major Lancaster (p. 43): Opposed to for all sites; present carriage satisfactory, but objectionable on account of being rendered unserviceable by small breakages.

Lieutenant Landon (p. 84): Opposed to for all sites. A very long report, in which the question of protection is considered, and the general care and attention needed to keep the present carriage in order is entered into in detail.

Captain Leary (p. 46): Opposed to for all sites; present carriage satisfactory so far as his experience goes; have worked well as machines, but practice with them unsatisfactory; gun should be considered from the standpoint of fire efficiency. A long report, with many quotations from various authors on the subject, principally with reference to the ineffectiveness of fire from shipboard on land fortifications; goes into question of relative cost of two types.

Captain Ruckman (p. 39): Impossible to brief this report. It is most comprehensive, covering 14 typewritten pages, and giving elaborate tables and other data in support of his conclusions. Captain Ruckman is strongly opposed to the use of a disappearing carriage for any gun on any site.

Lieutenant Spinks (p. 12): Opposed to for all sites; considers present carriage unsatisfactory; too many adjustments; the means of checking recoil defective; too many sliding parts; in his opinion, the present type of carriage should be used in small numbers compared with number of nondisappearing.

The following eight are named as favoring nondisappearing carriages without shields for all sites:

Lieutenant Applewhite (p. 67): Opposed to for all sites; present carriage very unsatisfactory; clearances not sufficient; liable to get out of order; retraction gear breaks; mechanism too delicate; requires too much time to operate; considers defects so serious that it would be impossible to overcome them; suggests that no more such carriages be used.

Captain Danes (p. 79): Report written on board transport for China; no data at hand, but refers to professional paper written by him on Seacoast Gun Mounts and Emplacements, in which he gives his reasons for being opposed to disappearing carriages and in favor of barbette. Opposed to carriage for all sites.

Captain Homer (p. 54): Opposed to for all sites; present carriage satisfactory of its kind; no objections; no suggestions.

Major Morris (p. 21): Opposed to for all sites; present carriages unsatisfactory; type is too complicated and machinery too delicate, and hence is rarely in perfect order; fails to work unless many conditions of adjustment are fulfilled; describes defects in detail.

Captain Schenck (p. 10): Opposed to on all sites; considers present carriage decidedly unsatisfactory and wholly unnecessary, in view of its excessive cost.

Captain Stewart (p. 13): Opposed to for all sites; considers present carriage unsatisfactory, being too complicated, requiring skilled mechanics, which we do not get in the artillery except in very limited numbers; noted defects in detail; recommends that as many disappearing carriages have been installed, owing to cost of replacing them they be continued in service, but that new mounts be barbette.

Captain Vogdes (p. 26): Not much in favor of disappearing carriages except for very close ranges; at long ranges nondisappearing carriages preferable; does not approve of shields on account of moral effect. Has had no opportunity to observe barbette carriages. Now serving in Porto Rico.

Colonel Woodruff (p. 42): Little or no experience with modern high-power guns; has not seen nondisappearing gun except at Watertown Arsenal; prefers barbette mount; disappearing carriages at Fort Warren work satisfactorily under the supervision of Major Crozier. Makes no suggestions.

The following three officers are named as favoring nondisappearing carriages with strong shields on high sites, turrets for low sites:

Captain Brown (p. 62): Opposed to on all sites; favors turret for low sites. Present carriages unsatisfactory; not familiar with barbette carriage; present carriage slow and unhandy; liable to get out of order; piston heads on older models too small; counterweights give trouble; so do crane and drum. Carriage is badly designed in every way. "We need a carriage we can drill with, not one so badly designed that we use it only six times a week, practically." Severely criticises all essential details of construction.

Colonel Haskin (p. 51): Opposed to for all sites; on low sites would use turret; present carriage satisfactory if we must have disappearing carriages at all; faults of construction which have developed have been for most part remedied; has serious misgivings as to whether these carriages will perform satisfactorily in excitement and hurry of actual fight; lack of care has serious results; defective platforms not easily repaired; has seen several such platforms; suggests the use of disappearing carriages on all low sites and the nondisappearing on all high sites since we have carriages of both types; the proportion of carriages to be determined by site.

Captain Walke (p. 26): Opposed to on all sites; prefers turret system on low sites; present carriage difficult to keep in thorough working order even in time of peace; retraction gear unwieldly; not adapted to subcaliber practice; carriage generally unsatisfactory.

The following six officers are named as giving no definite expression of opinion:

Lieutenant Berry (p. 71): At present opposed to carriage; prejudice might disappear after service with them; requests to be excused from answering.

Lieutenant Blake (p. 7): Opposed to on high and medium sites; for low sites opinion not formed; not had sufficient experience to form intelligent opinion.

Lieutenant Coe (p. 77): Has had no opportunity of judging; no opinion formed.

Captain Hubbell (p. 58): Has never served at a post provided with barbette battery and does not feel competent to express opinion. Present carriage satisfactory so far as he has observed; they fail occasionally when tripped; suggests that lever be provided to start the carriage in battery.

Lieutenant Lassiter (p. 43): Has had no experience with new coast fortifications, and consequently not in position to pass judgment.

Colonel McCrea (p. 17): Not having had any experience with the nondisappearing carriages, is not prepared to compare them; present carriage not entirely satisfactory; points out numerous defects; suggests that no more disappearing carriages be made until those we now have have been more thoroughly tested.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I call attention to the very last sentence of Colonel McCrea's letter. He is one of those officers quoted as having "no opinion" on this subject, and yet he suggests very forcibly "that no more disappearing carriages be made until those we now have have been more thoroughly tested." Senators who have followed the reading of the report will notice how many of these officers have stated the liability of these carriages to get out of order.

Captain Anderson, a very bright officer, states in "his opinion that one-half the carriages now mounted will be giving trouble half an hour after action begins." Several other officers speak of it as it actually is—experimental—and that a large enough proportion has already been constructed.

It is difficult to get at the total expense that we have incurred upon these disappearing carriages. I think there has been over $5,000,000 directly appropriated, and that does not cover the amount expended in experimental work. Of course, these inventors being in the Ordnance Department, all the experimental work has, I have no doubt, been done at the expense of the Government.

Besides this, of the appropriation of $50,000,000 at the beginning of the Cuban war, about thirteen millions went to coast defenses. How much of that went direct to carriages I have no means of ascertaining, but taking a fair proportion, I think it is safe to say—in fact, I am sure it is—that it must be very near $10,000,000 that have been directly expended upon these carriages. Besides that, the emplacements and the magazines cost very much more than do those for barbette carriages.

Furthermore, Mr. President, suppose these carriages should prove to be unsatisfactory. They have never yet been thoroughly tested, in my opinion, and that is the opinion expressed by several of these officers. They have never been put to the test they would be subjected to in time of actual war. Suppose they fail, as I am very confident they will in the end, their cost will be entirely lost.

You can not mount on a disappearing carriage a gun any longer than that for which it is made, and our guns already in the Army are shorter than the naval guns, and have less initial velocity. The tendency has been to make guns longer and longer, so that the slow-burning powders would have time to fully expand and give their force to the projectile before leaving the muzzle of the gun. On the disappearing carriage no longer gun than that for which it was intended can possibly be mounted. You can not possibly lengthen the gun without losing all our expenditure for the carriages and the emplacements, while on the barbette carriage there is no trouble in mounting a longer gun whenever desirable to do so.

I give from General Crozier's report, from abstract of reports of seacoast target practice, submitted to the subcommittee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, a transcript of the shots fired, with the weight of charge, kind of powder, weight of shot, and number of rounds, and a summary of the same, which shows that of a total of 209 shots of the 8-inch guns only 6 were with the service charge and service shot, and of the 251 rounds from a 10-inch gun only 4 were with full charge and shot, and of the 29 rounds from the 12-inch gun 8 were of full charge and shot; and out of the total of 489 shots only 18 were with full service charges and full service shot, and only 2 were with smokeless powder.

General Crozier says:

Reading right down the column it reads something like this: "No failure reported." "No failure reported." "No failure reported;" and so on and so on.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to the Digest of Target Practice with seacoast guns. It is part of the report received from the War Department, and I have made a summary of it. The report is printed, and anybody who so desires can make a summary of it.

The summary is as follows:

Gun.	Light-weight charge and light-weight shot.	Light-weight charge and full-weight shot.	Service charge and service shot.	Total.
8-inch	167	36	6	209
10-inch	157	90	4	251
12-inch		21	8	29

That is the character of the test this gun has been subjected to—mere pop-gun charges.

Mr. President, I would like to compare that with the table showing the yearly allowance of money for target practice by the Navy, all of which, I am informed, has been expended for the 10, 12, and 13 inch guns:

	Rounds per gun.
For 10, 12, and 13 inch guns	12
For 8-inch	18
For 4, 5, and 6 inch	24
For 3-inch	36

With full service charges of smokeless powder and full-weight shot.

In the digest of target practice by the Army, which I read, there were only two rounds, and those for 12-inch guns fired with smokeless powder. The others were with brown cocoa.

In regard to the sites, the report of the Chief of Engineers gives 302 guns that have been mounted, 254 of them on the disappearing carriage and only 48 on the nondisappearing carriage. Taking the percentage, I believe it is 84 per cent of the disappearing carriage, as I have figured it. I think one report from the Bureau of Ordnance states it at 87 per cent; but as I have figured it it is about the same. So there is no question that from 84 to 90 per cent have been mounted on disappearing carriages.

The Chief of Engineers in his report states that improved projects of defense call for a total of 478 heavy guns, of which 27 are to be mounted in turrets, 59 on nondisappearing carriages, and 397 on disappearing carriages, the latter being 83 per cent of the total number. The turret mounting has been abandoned, and these, I understand, are to be mounted on disappearing carriages, which makes the proportion of disappearing carriages 87 per cent instead of 83 per cent.

I am informed also that the Engineer Department proposes to mount guns on disappearing carriages for the defense of the Philippines and Porto Rico, and also the 16-inch experimental gun now under construction is to be mounted on a disappearing carriage. The expense of that will be hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Now, as to the height of the sites, 74 are reported by the Engineer Department as mounted on sites over 80 feet high. I called at the War Department this morning, the report not being ready, and took a list from a copy of a report they have sent here, but which was not received in time, showing the sites. In the list I have taken there are only 72, but that is near enough for all practical purposes. These heights run from 80 feet to 338 feet. These are the elevations. I will ask to have the list inserted in my remarks.

The list referred to is as follows:

6-inch on nondisappearing carriage	8
6-inch on disappearing carriage	31
8, 10, and 12 inch on nondisappearing carriage	48
On disappearing carriage	254

Height of sites for 72 guns.—1 at 122 feet, 2 at 338, 2 at 85, 2 at 233, 1 at 88, 3 at 90, 1 at 118, 1 at 235, 2 at 104, 1 at 145, 1 at 178, 1 at 184, 1 at 192, 2 at 197, 1 at 177, 1 at 203, 1 at 209, 3 at 85, 3 at 170, 1 at 80, 1 at 80.44, 5 at 80.03, 2 at 93, 2 at 105, 2 at 107, 5 at 144, 1 at 82, 2 at 136, 2 at 153, 2 at 170, 2 at 129, 2 at 122, 2 at 110, 3 at 94, 1 at 97, 4 at 105, 3 at 88.

Average height of site for these 72 guns, 131 feet.

Mr. MALLORY. Are those the elevations?

Mr. PROCTOR. Those are the elevations above the sea. These guns are all mounted at the seacoast.

Senators will notice that the condemnation of these high disappearing carriages on these high sites was almost universal in the reports of the artillery officers. It will be noticed from the reports of the officers that very little attention has been given to the barbette carriage. It is well known that our barbette carriage is very inferior to that used abroad; its advantages are largely counteracted by being so much higher.

The carriages used in foreign countries are quite low, and therefore largely protected by being low. The patents of the present disappearing carriage were sold to the Bethlehem Steel Company in 1896, six years ago. They have not sold one abroad. One experimental carriage is being made in Sweden, but they took out no patent there. They only took out patents in the leading countries, in England, France, and Germany, and those patents are in the name of the Bethlehem Steel Company.

I have just received this morning The Journal of the Military Service Institution for May, 1902. There is an article here from Captain Ruckman, a very able one. I will only read some brief extracts from it. The article is so long that I will not read it in full. Captain Ruckman speaks of the mechanical construction; he says that it costs much more, and he gives a table showing the difference in cost. The balance in favor of the barbette is $19,000 on a mount for a 12-inch gun; $7,000 for a 10-inch gun, and $2,300 on the 8-inch gun. This is his language:

1. Mechanical construction.—It is generally conceded that, for a given gun, a disappearing will cost more than a nondisappearing carriage. This applies to all classes of disappearing carriages. In the recent controversy this assumption has not been denied and all authorities within the knowledge of the writer accept it as a fact.

* * * * * * *

The Buffington-Crozier carriage undoubtedly costs more than the simple barbette mounts for same caliber now used in this country, but the difference in cost is not so great as would at first appear. The price of these carriages has varied from time to time and in different places. What is desired here is not so much the actual as the relative cost, since in the comparison it will be to the relative value that all results must finally reduce. With this object in mind the following data have been collected and arranged in tabular form to facilitate comparison:

Cost of Buffington-Crozier and barbette carriages for 6, 8, 10, and 12 inch guns.

	6-inch.		8-inch.		10-inch.		12-inch.
	Disappearing.	Barbette.	Disappearing.	Barbette.	Disappearing.	Barbette.	Disappearing.	Barbette.
Maximum	$7,400	$6,800	$12,820	$10,900	$19,000	$11,000	$42,000	$19,000
Minimum	6,450	6,800	9,500	7,500	15,500	11,000	32,000	14,220
Mean	6,875	6,800	11,160	9,200	17,650	11,000	37,000	16,610
Mean from all sources	7,000	6,800	11,000	8,700	18,000	11,000	36,000	17,000
Balance in favor of barbette mount		200		2,300		7,000		19,000

Taking cost of carriage, emplacement, and gun, caliber for caliber, we have the following aggregates per gun in position for the two classes of carriage:

DISAPPEARING GUNS.

	6-inch.	8-inch.	10-inch.	12-inch.
Disappearing carriage	$7,000	$11,000	$18,000	$36,000
Emplacement	27,000	45,000	47,000	54,000
Gun	6,000	12,000	25,000	41,000
Total per gun	40,000	68,000	90,000	131,000

BARBETTE GUNS.

Caliber of gun.	6-inch.	8-inch.	10-inch.	12-inch.
Barbette carriage	$6,800	$8,700	$11,000	$17,000
Emplacement for same	10,000	27,500	31,000	50,000
Gun	6,000	12,000	25,000	41,000
Total	22,800	48,200	67,000	108,000
Total for gun on disappearing mount	40,000	68,000	90,000	131,000
Balance in favor of barbette mount	17,200	19,200	23,000	23,000

The above figures show that for every 100 guns of each caliber mounted on disappearing carriages 171 of the 6-inch, 142 of the 8-inch, 134 of the 10-inch, and 121 of the 12-inch could be mounted on simple barbette carriages. The average balance in favor of the barbette mount is about $20,000, which would probably install a rapid-firing 6-inch gun with shield on pedestal mount, giving a muzzle velocity of 3,000 feet and capable of being fired eight times per minute.

Therefore, by mounting the heavier guns on the simple barbette mount, for each one so mounted another of the kind just described could be mounted for the additional money now being expended on disappearing mounts. This would provide the defense with the same number of guns and give it in addition an equal number of the 6-inch rapid-firing guns, whose presence in future defense of harbors will be essential to success. This phase of the problem demands reflection.

* * * * * * *

The number of large parts making up the disappearing carriage is approximately 340 and the small pieces, including bolts, about 1,400, while for the other carriage these numbers are about 130 and 660, respectively. The weight of the disappearing carriage is about 93,000 pounds and for the barbette carriage about 55,000 pounds.

* * * * * * *

Friction varies from hour to hour with the amount of lubrication, dust, and sand blowing about, and frequently a carriage left in working order at night will not go into battery in the morning without a readjustment of the counterweight.

* * * * * * *

The service disappearing carriage is particularly affected by the sand blast existing along the coast. The sliding parts become clogged, and, owing to the difficulty of getting at the surfaces, the sand can be removed only with great labor, perhaps to be blown in again the same day. A readjustment of the counterweight becomes necessary or a change in the oil in the cylinders. Both of these operations are tentative, and differ for drill and practice and for full and reduced charges. In short, with every new set of conditions a new and original problem arises for solution, and one feels compelled to stop and consider what would be the result of being compelled during battle to adjust counterweights, rig retraction gears, or change the amount of oil in the cylinders, necessitated, perhaps, by a change of ammunition.

* * * * * * *

Touching the subject of care of the carriage, the amount required for the disappearing carriage may be taken at not less than ten times that for other carriages, and the writer is not aware of any barbette carriage that ever failed to run "in battery" although neglected for months at a time.

* * * * * * *

The 6, 8, 10, and 12 inch disappearing carriages mount their guns, on an average, about 10 feet higher than the more simple barbette or pedestal mount. Assuming that 10 feet is a reasonable superior limit for height of a barbette gun above sea level, a comparison of values for the same target and gun at 10 and 20 feet above the sea will give a good idea of the relative hitting efficiency of the two classes of guns. This comparison reveals an enormous loss in hits due to the higher mounting of the gun on disappearing carriage. The efficacy of fire of the gun on low mount increases as the hostile ship approaches, while that of the gun on the high mount diminishes more and more as the range shortens, resulting in a great reduction in offensive power at the critical moment when most urgently needed.

It should be borne in mind that of the inventors of this carriage one of them has been Chief of Ordnance for several years and the second has now been appointed, and it is perfectly natural that they should exploit their own inventions—and they have had an opportunity to do so at immense expense to the Government.

I wish to call attention to the character of the replies which these artillery officers made to the War Department to be seen by the Chief of Ordnance, a mere staff officer of the Secretary of War. Under such circumstances it was but natural that the officers should be somewhat diplomatic in their answers and a little careful. My attention was attracted to that by seeing a personal letter a day or two since from an officer whose report is here. His report was against the carriage, but moderately so; not more opposed than many others. In his letter he says, what I believe to be true, that "it is a stupendous blunder."

I think, Mr. President, the weight of evidence of these reports is very strongly in favor of the following points:

First. The disappearing carriage, its emplacement, and magazine are much more costly to build and maintain.

Second. It is easily disabled by sand, dirt, or any substance falling on sliding surfaces or thrown on by bursting shell, and requires constant care of higher class mechanics than the service furnishes to keep in order.

Third. If the same time, money, and attention had been given to the improvement of the barbette carriage that has been given to the disappearing carriage, we should have had many more guns mounted for the same money and our defenses would have been in far better condition for immediate service.

Fourth, and strongest. That if disappearing guns are used at all they should only be used on low or medium sites, and the number of guns mounted on barbette carriages should be in much greater proportion. In fact, many guns have been and are being mounted on sites so high that they are almost universally condemned by these reports.

I have given the height of 72 sites averaging 131 feet.

It seems to me, Mr. President, it is conclusively established that it would be unwise—in fact, the height of folly—to expend any more money for these carriages until we can have tests made by a disinterested board of officers and mechanical experts, as is recommended by several of these letters, with full service charges and under all the conditions that would exist in war.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the very question I asked a while ago, in the beginning, whether there had been any such tests as that made with full charges.

Mr. PROCTOR. I read during the Senator's absence a summary of one of the reports that had been submitted, but too late for me to examine it thoroughly. In the digest of target practice with seacoast guns there have been 489 shots fired, 324 of them with light-weight charge and light-weight shot, 147 with light-weight charge and full-weight shot, and only 18 out of 489 with service charge and service shot.

I also gave in that connection, while the Senator was absent, the difference in the target practice of the Navy. Their allowance, which I am informed has all been expended, is for 10, 12, and 13 inch guns, 12 rounds per gun; for 8-inch guns, 18 rounds per gun; for 4, 5, and 6 inch guns, 24 rounds per gun; for 3-inch guns, 36 rounds per gun, with full-service charges of smokeless powder and full-weight shot. In the Army tests there were but 2 rounds, and that for 12-inch guns only—2 rounds of smokeless powder. The rest were with brown powder.

Mr. MALLORY. Before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to make an inquiry for information. Can the Senator state whether any of the great powers of Europe use disappearing gun carriages on their fortifications?

Mr. PROCTOR. To the best of my information it has never been used in Germany. The turret system is used there. In France it has never been used to any extent; the barbette system prevails. In England an attempt was made to use it some. It was used, I think, in four unimportant forts, but it has been discontinued.

Mr. HARRIS. That was a different carriage from this, a different patent. If the Senator will allow me to suggest, the English experiment was entirely on what is known as the hydraulic-lift carriage, not on the disappearing type, as used in our service.

Mr. WARREN. Not upon the counterpoise. The system was not the counterpoise.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, this Bethlehem Steel Company, a pretty energetic business company, has owned the foreign patents, subject to a royalty to be paid to Generals Buffington and Crozier, for about six years, and it is admitted they have not sold one. Sweden is building on her own account an experimental carriage. It is a fair presumption that if foreign countries are seeking this carriage in the last six years they would have bought some.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator another question, if he will permit me. If the disappearing gun carriage is not practicable for medium or great elevations and it would have to be abandoned at such sites, would that necessitate an additional expenditure on the fortifications to change their character from what they are now, adapted to the purposes of barbette guns?

Mr. PROCTOR. It would.

Mr. MALLORY. That would involve, then, considerable additional expense?

Mr. PROCTOR. Very large. The carriage would be entirely lost, and the emplacement, as I understand it. The carriage certainly would.

Mr. MALLORY. Then it would practically amount to largely rebuilding some of the fortifications that we have constructed at great expense in recent years?

Mr. PROCTOR. It would necessitate rebuilding the armament.

Mr. MALLORY. I am speaking also of the fortification itself, aside from the armament.

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes; it would involve a change in that and in magazines. Magazines for the disappearing carriages are located very low. I have sent in an inquiry in regard to the condition of magazines, and I was informed unofficially that that ought to be considered confidential, so as not to give foreign countries the information.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I ask right there, Is this an American invention? Is it in use in other countries or simply in the United States?

Mr. PROCTOR. Simply in the United States. Only one experimental carriage is being built in Sweden. Although this steel company has had the foreign patents for six years, no foreign power has adopted this carriage yet.

Mr. MALLORY. There is another point, Mr. President, to which I would like to call the Senator's attention, and that is with reference to the report of target practice here. In hurriedly running over it—I have not been able to give the matter attention—I find that in a great majority of instances the experiment has not been unsatisfactory. As the Senator has said, the report in many instances is "no failure reported," which is rather peculiar language. The Senator, in his comment on this, called attention to the fact that the charges used were much less than the service charge. I observe in one of the comments, in the case of Capt.

J. A. Lundeen, reported on page 104, as to an experiment at Rodman, Mass., he says:

Owing to small charge, gun did not recoil sufficiently to catch in ratchets, and had to be hauled back by hand.

There was a defect, apparently a failure, but it was not due, I infer from this report, to any defect in the carriage itself, but was really due to the fact that there was not a service charge used—that the charge was not sufficient to drive the gun back.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the benefit of such charges?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know that there is any, but it is not fair to a carriage to put that down as a failure, because it was not used under such conditions as those under which it would be used in the event of real service.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, in that case they probably got the charge a little bit too small. This is a beautiful piece of mechanism, and with just the right charge, very moderate, much less than the service charge, it will play back and forth very well, but it has never had the trial with the service charge and war conditions to demonstrate its usefulness.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator from Vermont if he wishes to make the unqualified statement that Sweden is not using a disappearing carriage, very much the same as ours, and that it only has one experimental disappearing gun carriage?

Mr. PROCTOR. I think it has appeared in some way before the Committee on Military Affairs that they were constructing one experimental carriage. I have no positive knowledge in regard to it.

Mr. WARREN. May I state at this moment some information I have?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Of course there is information in the War Department which it is hardly fair for it to send to the Senate. I am informed they are using in Sweden a good many of the disappearing carriages called the Bofors, which is really much the same carriage as the Buffington-Crozier. You will recall that the Bethlehem people did not take out patents in that country; therefore Sweden has a right to make the carriages.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What country is that?

Mr. PROCTOR. Sweden.

Mr. WARREN. Sweden. I have, in looking over the papers, found the following quotation, which I will submit:

Referring to previous correspondence on the subject of disappearing-gun carriages I have the honor to say that I have to-day received official information from the minister of war in Sweden.

"That high-power guns with disappearing carriages are mounted in the fortifications of Sweden, and give satisfaction. Three of the largest have been placed in position during the present year and work admirably. These guns are made at the Swedish manufactory at Bofors and patented by this manufactory."

* * * * * * *

In reply to instructions, I have been officially notified by the Swedish Government as follows:

Modern guns now mounted, 24-centimeter guns are the largest; of these 60 per cent are mounted on disappearing carriages, Bofors pattern, 40 per cent in armored casemates.

* * * * * * *

Disappearing gun carriages were somewhat out of favor here in Sweden until recently when the new Bofors carriages were set up. But they have worked so successfully that officers who had formerly opposed them are their warmest advocates—for heavy guns. The artillery officers of the garrison where they have just been mounted say that they can be fired as rapidly as the other styles of carriages, and can be handled by a single man without any effort. * * *

The 24-cm. rifles, which are the largest guns in use, are, as far as practicable, to be mounted on disappearing carriages. The old guns were mounted on old carriages of English manufacture, which were very unsatisfactory. The new carriage, known as the Bofors-Buffington, is a modification of the American carriage.

* * * * * * *

The price of gun and carriage is about $60,000 or $70,000.

* * * * * * *

For coast defense the Swedes do not mount guns of any higher caliber than 15 cm. on barbette carriages.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President. Sweden is not a country of much military importance. Does the Senator claim that England, France, and Germany are making and mounting these guns on these carriages?

Mr. WARREN. No; I do not. But England has disappearing carriages and has them in use.

There are a great many in use in Italy. So far as Germany is concerned, as the Senator says, they are using a different style of gun, a very large type in revolving armored cupolas or turrets, that costs, the complete establishment, three or four and sometimes six hundred thousand dollars to install, as against our cost of installation of a smaller gun—a Buffington-Crozier carriage gun—amounting to less, perhaps, than $100,000. They have the guns in place, and therefore are not taking them out to substitute the other. They have not the right there to use the Buffington-Crozier patent, of course, without paying the royalty or making arrangements with the Bethlehem people.

Mr. PROCTOR. What does the Senator think about the use of them in England?

Mr. WARREN. My information regarding England generally is that she is about as much behind in adopting this later style of gun carriage as she is in keeping up with the march of American industrial progress. I think she is slightly behind.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Or her army?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; or her army.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think there is no question but that England has expended an enormous amount of time and money in attempting to perfect a disappearing carriage of altogether a different model. She has been working on a disappearing carriage which is lifted up or down by a hydraulic or pneumatic pressure, and I believe she has not made a success of that form of disappearing carriage. But nations naturally seek to have some peculiar armament of their own. They do not necessarily or generally follow the steps of other nations.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I thought I had the title page of a very recent publication here with me. I have it somewhere, but I do not see it at this moment. It is by a major of the Royal Engineers, who is an official of the great English Woolwich Arsenal. That publication is by Murray & Sons. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts if that is not a London house?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. PROCTOR. It is published by Murray & Sons, and was dated, on the title page, March 2, 1892. It has been sent to Dutton & Co., of New York, to have it published in this country. I have a few sheets here. I have somewhere the title page, but I have given it substantially. I have a few sheets of the copy sent from England for Dutton & Co. to examine it in regard to its publication. The chapter on "Carriages" is very brief. It is headed "Barbette, the only modern type of mounting." It says:

The barbette system is practically the only system now used in the mounting of guns for coast defense. * * * Even on low sites the advantages of the disappearing mounting are neutralized by the slow rate of fire possible. The barbette principle is now universally employed by us.

In a note the author speaks of a few guns that can not be worked by hand and some mounted in turrets now, but he does not allude to the disappearing carriage.

Mr. PERKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Will my colleague on the committee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. In reply, further, to the inquiry of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] as to England. I have here a quotation from Gen. Andrew Clark, inspector-general of fortifications for England, in which he says, speaking of the whole matter of the necessity for disappearing guns:

The disappearing principle will undoubtedly remain in some form, since it must always be an exceedingly effective mode of protection on account of extreme invisibility. A disappearing gun in a well-placed pit, provided with a turtle back, splinterproof shield, is probably far better protected than in a turret. Moreover, a gun so mounted possesses the great advantage that future advances in the offensive power of ironclads are little likely to diminish the value of its protection.

Mr. PROCTOR. What is the date?

Mr. WARREN. This is 1884.

The disappearing principle will undoubtedly remain in some form, since it must always be an exceedingly effective moment of protection on account of extreme invisibility.

Now, in 1890 Col. Sir George Clarke, R. E., says:

Of all methods of mounting yet proposed the disappearing principle offers the greatest advantages, and provided that the mechanical difficulties can be overcome this method will receive wide adoption. The gun, laid under cover by a position finder, will be vulnerable only for a few seconds before each round. Its exact position can only be identified during the brief period of visibility. There appears to be no satisfactory mode of attacking it.

This was some years later, in 1890. The other was in 1884.

Also, in speaking of the English hydropneumatic carriage, he says:

For the purpose of coast defense this form of mounting is ideal in conception. Provided that the hydropneumatic arrangement is in good working order, there is practically no hope of silencing guns thus mounted by the fire of ships. Their position can be rendered absolutely indistinguishable from the surroundings if a little care has been disposed upon the works. They need be exposed only for a brief period before the moment of firing.

It will be observed he is speaking of their own gun, which has not the counterpoise weights and easy action of the Buffington-Crozier.

He says further:

The disappearing principle is ideal in conception, and, provided that skilled supervision is available, these mountings ought to be easily kept in serviceable condition. * * * The advantages this method of mounting offers—complete invisibility until the moment of firing, and practical immunity from all danger to the gun's crew—can scarcely be overestimated. Against disappearing guns the armament of a ship is powerless.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I understood that perfectly well. That first report was made eighteen years ago and the next one twelve years ago. As I stated, at that period, early in the invention of high-explosive powders and long guns, attention all over the world was directed to some disappearing gun. It was thought necessary to go back to the early principle that we had followed in Indian fighting, to fire and then get behind a tree and load again. But modern experience has demonstrated that that is poor policy; that the side wins that throws the most iron and throws it fastest and throws it with the best aim. That was demonstrated plainly at Manila and Santiago, and it has been demonstrated everywhere. The disappearing principle has never been subjected to the test of war, and whenever it is it will be found to be a lamentable failure.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, it is with some temerity that I venture, on behalf of the committee, to oppose the amendment proposed by my friend from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I realize the fact that he himself is a distinguished soldier; that he has been Secretary of War; that he is the ranking member and acting chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and therefore in anything he may have to say he speaks ex cathedra; he speaks by reason of his position, from his knowledge of affairs. And yet it is barely possible, Mr. President, that some of us, who know more about nautical affairs and the ships of war that would assail these forts, may have some thoughts that we may advance that will be a benefit to this discussion.

That alone gives me courage on the part of the committee to venture the assertion that when a ship of war anchored off the Golden Gate, at the port of San Francisco, sees a target 3 or 4 miles away that she can fire at again and again with her 12-inch guns 14 times in ten minutes, which has been done, sending a projectile that weighs 1,000 pounds, and the target does not disappear, it gives them a decided advantage over firing at a blank space where disappearing guns on a carriage go down where they can not be seen.

But I am not giving my testimony alone, Mr. President. During the five or six years that I have been upon the subcommittee on the fortifications appropriation bill it has been my privilege to listen to gentlemen who have won their spurs, as my friend from Vermont has done, and their epaulets, in front of the battle, who have appeared before that committee and have given their testimony relative to fortifications and ordnance, to guns and lines of defenses which they believe are the most modern improvements of the day.

On March 3, 1885, an act was approved, and President Cleveland appointed a Board of Ordnance and Fortification, known as the Endicott board. It consisted of Hon. William C. Whitney, then Secretary of the Navy; Gen. Stephen V. Benét, Chief of Engineers; Gen. John Newton, United States Engineers; Col. H. L. Abbot, captain, Corps of Engineers; Capt. Charles S. Smith, of the Ordnance Bureau; Commander W. T. Sampson, United States Navy; Commander Casper S. Goodrich, United States Navy; Joseph Morgan, jr., of Pennsylvania, and Erastus Corning, of New York, civilians. This, as I have stated, was known as the Endicott board. They were appointed by the President for the purpose of devising a plan of fortifications at different ports in the United States, commencing on the coast of Maine and continuing to the coast of Texas, and from San Diego, in California, to Puget Sound, in the State of Washington.

Since that time the Board of Ordnance and Fortification has been perpetuated and continued. Under the act of September 22, 1888, the Board of Ordnance and Fortification was organized, composed of the Commanding General of the United States Army as president, a United States engineer officer, a United States artillery officer, and a United States ordnance officer. February 24, 1891, a civilian was added to the members of that board. So it has been continued from year to year, and under their direction the plan of the Endicott board has been continued. They have carried out in a general way the plan which was then devised and promulgated and approved by the Secretary of War.

Congress has annually appropriated about $100,000 for their experimenting with guns and carriages and ammunition. They have made certain allotments when they have been satisfied that the inventor had merit; and so they have gone on, not a close corporation, but gentlemen who stand in their professional lines at the very top of the list, gentlemen who have the respect and confidence of all who know them. During the time I have had the honor of being a member of this committee of the Senate I think they have allotted about half a million dollars for experimental tests in guns and powder and ammunition and shells, which has been expended in perfecting the invention of those who brought it to their attention.

So I think, Mr. President, the charge of the Senator from Vermont is hardly just to these eminent men when he says it has been a close corporation, so to speak, and that only those who have had influence with them or belonged to the Army would have the consideration that they ought to have had. I am sure such was not the case when he was Secretary of War for every act of that Board of Ordnance was approved by him and there was no criticism whatever during his administration. It is only fair to assume that his successors have followed in the wise footsteps that he had left for them and the wise precepts and example which they had to follow. I think that all who have inventions that possess merit have had an opportunity of having them tested at the expense of the Government.

Mr. President, my friend has referred to the extravagant difference between the cost of the barbette emplacement and of the disappearing carriage. I anticipated that such a charge would be made, and I therefore communicated with the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance asking him to kindly write me showing the cost of a fixed 8, 10, and 12 inch gun, its emplacement in a barbette, and its cost upon a disappearing carriage. I will ask the Secretary, with your permission, to read this letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, May 9, 1902.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In further reply to your letter of yesterday I can now furnish the following information:

The cost of the 6-inch gun and its carriage is as follows:

On simple barbette carriage:
Average cost of 6-inch rifle	$7,686.00
Estimated cost of simple barbette carriage	7,500.00
Total for the gun and carriage	15,186.00
On disappearing carriage:
Average cost of 6-inch rifle	7,686.00
Average cost of 6-inch disappearing carriage	6,616.66
Total cost of gun and carriage	14,302.66

The greater cost of a simple barbette carriage for this caliber of gun is due to the protective shield which is required for the mechanism of the gun and the cannoneers. It is difficult to give a statement of the cost of emplacements for the two methods of mounting these guns, as very few of the emplacements have been constructed, and there are really no typical designs therefor on hand. There is no reason why the two classes of emplacements, if constructed with a view of affording the same degree of protection and the same degree of convenience of operation of the guns, should differ in cost.

The cost of emplacing 8-inch rifles by the two methods is as follows:

On simple barbette carriage:
Average cost of 8-inch rifle	$11,484.94
Cost of simple barbette carriage, with shield	18,208.00
Total cost of gun and carriage	29,692.94
Estimated cost of emplacement	45,000.00
Total cost of gun, carriage, and emplacement	74,692.94
On disappearing carriage:
Average cost of 8-inch rifle	$11,484.94
Average cost of 8-inch disappearing carriage	10,651.52
Total cost of gun and carriage	22,136.46
Estimated cost of emplacement	50,000.00
Total cost of gun, carriage, and emplacement	72,136.46

In this case the greater cost of the simple barbette carriage results partly from the cost of the necessary shield, as with the 6-inch carriage, and partly from the increased cost of the only 8-inch barbette carriages which have been built, viz, those which were constructed at the beginning of the work of reconstruction of the coast defenses, due to the lack of experience at that time in building machines of this size.

The cost of emplacing the 10-inch guns has been as follows:

On simple barbette carriage:
Average cost of 10-inch rifle	$22,632.77
Cost of simple barbette carriage with shield	20,319.93
Total cost of gun and carriage	42,952.70
Cost of emplacement	55,000.00
Total cost of gun, carriage, and emplacement	97,952.70
On disappearing carriage:
Average cost of 10-inch rifle	22,632.77
Average cost of 10-inch disappearing carriage, model of 1896	15,935.22
Total cost of gun and carriage	38,567.99
Cost of emplacement	60,000.00
Total cost of gun, carriage, and emplacement	98,567.99

The cost of emplacing 12-inch rifles by the two methods is as follows:

On simple barbette carriage:
Average cost of 12-inch rifle	$30,425.51
Cost of simple barbette carriage, with shield	25,210.98
Total cost of gun and carriage	61,636.49
Cost of emplacement	65,000.00
Total cost of gun, carriage, and emplacement	126,636.49
In disappearing carriage:
Average cost of 12-inch rifle	36,425.51
Average cost of 12-inch disappearing carriage	32,628.46
Total cost of gun and carriage	69,053.97
Cost of emplacement	70,000.00
Total cost of gun, carriage, and emplacement	139,053.97

In this last case the total cost with the disappearing method is $12,414.48 in excess of that with the barbette. Five thousand dollars of this amount is due to the difference in estimated cost of the emplacements; but it may be said that this $5,000 is more or less accidental, as there is no essential reason why the emplacement for the disappearing gun should cost any more than that for the barbette. As a matter of fact, the disappearing emplacements have cost more, and this is what has undoubtedly guided the Chief of Engineers, from whose estimates the above figures for the emplacements have been taken, in fixing the cost of the two kinds.

The parapet required for the disappearing gun is no higher than that required for the barbette, as the height results from other considerations than the character of the carriage upon which the gun is mounted, and if the degree of protection and the other features are given equal consideration in the two classes it is believed that the difference of cost would disappear. It is known that at some places where all the conditions have been the same, because of the two classes of emplacements being constructed in the same locality, the disappearing emplacement has cost no more than that for the barbette gun.

The cost of the Abbott gun lift at Sandy Hook, including the two guns, with their carriages and the emplacement, was $625,000.

There are now mounted upon our seacoast or provided for 58 6 inch, 8-inch, 10-inch, and 12-inch guns upon simple barbette carriages and 275 upon disappearing carriages. Most of these are already installed.

In regard to the experimental character of the disappearing carriage, I can only say that it is now eight years since those of the service type were tried and adopted, and that for several years past they have been in use in our fortifications. Opinions from 91 artillery officers in regard to them were obtained by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification in the latter part of the year 1900, which have been published in Senate Document No. 336 of the present session of Congress. It is believed that, owing to the greater experience since had with them, expressions obtained from artillery officers would now be more favorable to the carriage than those which were then given, but 75 per cent of the letters above referred to indicated their authors to be in favor of disappearing carriages for the kind of sites for which they were originally intended, viz, low sites and sites of medium height. For a further discussion, with evidence, of the merits of the service carriage, I would refer you to the memorandum inclosed with my letter of yesterday, which also refers to the action of England, France, and Germany with regard to the type.

Hoping that this information may be of service to you and that you will not hesitate to call for anything further on the subject which you may desire, I am, Senator,

Very respectfully, WILLIAM CROZIER.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. The Senator spoke in the highest terms of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. Does the Senator want us to understand that they approve of these disappearing gun carriages?

Mr. PERKINS. I certainly do. Your committee most certainly so understand it.

Mr. PETTUS. I understand it exactly the other way.

Mr. PERKINS. They could not be ordered without their sanction and without the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. PETTUS. I was speaking merely of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification and their opinion.

Mr. PERKINS. Your committee certainly understand that the disappearing carriage has been manufactured by their approval and recommendation. I will give the Senator, with his permission, in a few minutes, a slight history of the disappearing carriage. The present Board of Ordnance and Fortification consists of the president, who is Lieutenant-General Miles; General Gillespie, chief of engineers; Colonel Rodgers, of the artillery; General Randolph, chief of artillery; Major Shaler, of the Ordnance Department; Major Pratt, of the artillery, and Mr. Henderson, the civilian member. These are the seven members of the board. Captain Taylor is the recorder, and, of course, is not a member of the board.

Your committee understand, I will say in answer to my friend from Alabama, that none of these plans of fortifications are carried out without the approval of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification and their action is approved by the Secretary of War. The figures which I have given in comparison with the cost of the barbette emplacement for the guns and the disappearing carriage is in marked contrast to that of the Abbot lift at Sandy Hook. There are two 12-inch guns mounted upon the Abbot lift at Sandy Hook for which the Government paid $625,000. It is a complicated piece of machinery. There are two engines, with the necessary boilers, and it is a work of many hours to get the steam up and to get the lifts in operation. The point of economy your committee in considering this question have had before them during the past five years or more. They have taken that into consideration as well as other questions bearing upon the subject-matter.

When, in 1888, Congress broke the ice and—after twenty-five years of neglect—decided upon the reconstruction of the coast defenses, the Ordnance Department sent abroad an officer to—among other duties—seek a serviceable type of the disappearing carriage, which had been decided to be necessary. A few more or less unsatisfactory experimental mounts were found, but the only carriage which had been actually installed for any service was the Elswick hydro-pneumatic, which was in use in England, in Italy, and in some British colonies and less advanced countries. This type was at once rejected as being too complicated, as well as otherwise unsatisfactory, and the attempt to provide a carriage from abroad was abandoned.

I wish to say that in giving the history of this disappearing carriage I have compiled the testimony from interviews with members of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, with artillery officers, with members of the Bureau of Ordnance, and others, and, therefore, I believe this compilation of the history of the disappearing carriage which I am now giving is correct beyond a question.

Four types of domestic production were considered—the King, the pneumatic, the Gordon, and the Buffington-Crozier. The first mentioned did not get beyond the stage of discussion, and after full consideration was abandoned as being unsuited to long, high-powered guns, although it had been tried with promise for the guns of an earlier period. The pneumatic carriage was the production of a private corporation, the Pneumatic Gun Carriage and Power Company. A representative of the type was built for a 10-inch gun and tested at Government expense, the total cost being $70,792.

This was an experimental test paid for by the Government to an inventor who claimed that he had discovered a new plan whereby these guns might be more expeditiously handled than they had been heretofore.

The Gordon carriage for a 10-inch gun was next tried, after a long time consumed also in getting it to work. At its official test ten rounds were fired in a few minutes under an hour, hand power only being required. The cost to the United States was $62,632. The installation and test of both of these types was attended with numerous vexatious delays caused by breakages and other failures.

During this period of effort Captain Crozier was in charge of the subject of the supply of gun carriages in the office of the Chief of Ordnance. He was of opinion that it was very doubtful whether any of the designs under consideration would result in the satisfactory carriage which was demanded of the Department. In looking over the various projects he was satisfied that a design proposed twenty years previously by Colonel Buffington, of the Ordnance Department, embodied a sound principle, and he caused suggestions to be sent to Colonel Buffington requesting him to modify and act upon the suggestion.

This Colonel Buffington declined to do, and Captain Crozier then went on with his own plans and ideas.

The first design was of a carriage for an 8-inch gun, which was submitted by the Ordnance Department to the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. It met with such favor on the part of this board that the Ordnance Department was requested to submit a design for a 10-inch carriage, in order that the test of the one for the gun of larger caliber might suffice for both. Captain Crozier then made the design for the 10-inch carriage, and the Department returned it, giving its reasons for having originally submitted the 8-inch design; these being in general those which would naturally suggest themselves in the view of commencing with the smaller, more easily constructed and less expensive machine.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I wish to suggest to the Senator in charge of this bill that day before yesterday we secured a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on a most important measure immediately after the close of the routine business to-morrow morning. It is extremely important that that measure should be debated, and we are in a situation where if we vote to-morrow morning, and, of course, we must vote, because unanimous consent has been given, we shall not have an opportunity to debate the bill. I ask the Senator if he will not kindly allow this bill to go over, because it appears evident that it is going to give rise to extended debate, and we shall then have no opportunity to debate the union station bill.

Mr. PERKINS. The rest of the history of this carriage I am willing to place in the RECORD without wearying the Senate by reading it.

The Board of Ordnance and Fortification decided to build from both designs and allotted the money for the construction of the two experimental carriages.

The 8-inch carriage was completed first, in the year 1893. It was installed and brought to the State for final test without accident or unforseen delay of any kind, and at its final trial ten rounds were fired in twelve minutes and twenty-one seconds. The cost of the carriage and its test was $30,829.

After the test of the Gordon carriage, and before that of the Buffington-Crozier, a contract was made by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification for a second Gordon carriage for 10-inch gun, with certain stipulations in regard to its operation. Based upon the experience then had, the standard rate of fire was taken as 10 rounds per hour, and a premium of $2,000 was provided for every round over that number, accompanied by a penalty of $1,000 for every round by which the rate should fall short. Delays and failures characterized the installation and preliminary work of this carriage also, but at its final test 32 rounds were fired in an hour and a premium earned of $44,000. The total price of the construction, installation, tests, premium, and alteration was $118,165.

Finally there was tested the 10-inch Buffington-Crozier carriage, from which, after the same satisfactory installation as the 8-inch, there were fired 10 rounds in fourteen minutes and forty-two seconds, a rate four times that previously taken as a standard. The cost of the carriage and its test was $54,315.

In regard to these two carriages the Board of Ordnance officers which tested them reported as follows:

It is considered by the board that the test of this carriage has demonstrated that it possesses in a marked degree the properties which should pertain to a disappearing carriage for high-power guns.

It is simple in construction, so that its parts and their purposes are easily understood.

Loading and maneuvering are effected by operations which are accomplished by hand with ease, certainty, and great rapidity, and these operations simulate very closely those required with the barbette carriages already adopted by the Department.

No valves or pumps of any kind are required, a feature regarded by the board as very desirable, as it insures certainty that the carriage will at all times be in proper working order and ready for action.

The fact that the entire test of the carriage, involving the firing of 47 rounds, was conducted without the breaking of a part or the bending of a bolt indicates great care and skill on the part of the designer in proportioning its parts and adjusting them to the work which they were intended to perform.

And, speaking of the test of the 10-inch carriage:

The advantages of this system of disappearing carriage are fully set forth in the report of the board on the 8-inch carriage, before referred to. These advantages are confirmed and emphasized by the trial of a carriage adapted for a gun of much greater caliber and power, and it is the opinion of the board that the exhaustive test to which this system has now been subjected demonstrates that on account of the simplicity of its construction, involving no valves, pumps, or other complicated appliances, and the fact that by methods easily understood by the average artillery soldier the operations of loading and maneuvering are effected with remarkable ease, certainty, and rapidity, it is worthy of adoption for use in the service on all sites except those where an all-round traverse is absolutely necessary.

After the trial of the three types of carriage mentioneda bove, a board composed of one officer of engineers, one ordnance officer, and one artillery officer was, at the request of the Chief of Ordnance, convened by the Secretary of War to report "which of the various types of disappearing carriages for seacoast fortifications that had been on trial by the Ordnance Department during the last four years is best adapted for the service of the United States." The board reported as follows:

After a full consideration, the board is of the opinion that the Buffington-Crozier type of depressing gun carriage is, of the three types represented, best adapted for service in our seacoast defenses. It appears to have sufficient strength and durability, gives the required amount of protection cover, is easily operated and manipulated by hand; admits of traversing, elevating, and depressing the gun sufficient to give as great a field of fire as is required in most positions, and can be built and erected at a comparatively low cost.

The following quotations are made from the reports of the Board of Ordnance and Fortifications, viz, from the report from October 31, 1893, to October 31, 1894 (Maj. Gen. J. M. Schofield, president; Col. Henry L. Abbott, Corps of Engineers; Col. Henry W. Closson, Fourth United States Artillery; Maj. Frank H. Phipps, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and Mr. Byron M. Cutcheon, members):

The 8-inch carriage of this type had been received at the proving ground prior to the last annual report, and was being assembled and mounted on that date.

Since then it has passed a most satisfactory test at the hands of the Ordnance Board, exceeding for rapidity and smoothness of operation the most sanguine expectations of this board. This is an absolutely new type of disappearing carriage, the result of the combined inventions of Colonel Buffington, United States Ordnance Department, and Captain Crozier, Ordnance Department. It is a strictly American invention. Although of an entirely novel type, never before subjected to trial, it passed successfully through its test without so much as the breakage of a bolt or any accident whatever. Only slight alterations in the recoil mechanism were required. The board regards this as a remarkable record. This is a front-pintle carriage and traverses through 180 degrees.

* * * * * * *

The board recommends that liberal appropriations be made, so that the expenditures for guns of this caliber and emplacements therefor, already made, may be speedily utilized.

Ten-inch Crozier-Buffington disappearing carriage: This carriage, which was in process of fabrication at the date of last report, has been completed, assembled on its platform at Sandy Hook, and fully tested and accepted during the year.

The carriage does not materially differ, except in proportions, from the 8-inch carriage. Only slight modifications were required, especially in the hydraulic cylinders for checking recoil, in order to make it work satisfactorily. Like the 8-inch carriage of this type, the test has been completed without accident and to the entire satisfaction of the board.

The Secretary of War, in his annual report for the year 1894, writes as follows:

The establishment of type disappearing gun carriages for 8-inch and 10-inch guns, invented by officers of the Ordnance Corps, and believed to be unequaled for rapidity and simplicity of action by any carriage elsewhere in use, is a notable achievement of the year. This problem solved, the armament of our harbors may now be prosecuted as rapidly as means are available.

* * * * * * *

At the date of the last annual report of the Department a selection of a type carriage for 8 and 10 inch guns was expected within a few months. Since then the 8-inch Buffington-Crozier disappearing carriage has been tried with results, as stated by the Board of Ordnance, exceeding for rapidity and smoothness of operation the most sanguine expectations of this board. The carriage is the combined invention of Colonel Buffington and Captain Crozier, of the Ordnance Department, and reflects credit on the inventive skill of American officers.

It is a satisfactory solution of one of the most difficult problems which has confronted military science. I concur in the recommendation that liberal appropriations be made for the manufacture of these carriages for service, so that expenditures for guns of this caliber and emplacements prepared for them may be speedily utilized.

The annual message of the President to Congress of December 7, 1896, makes the following reference:

During the same year, immediately preceding the message referred to, the first modern gun carriage had been completed and 11 more were in process of construction. All but one were of the nondisappearing type. These, however, were not such as to secure necessary cover for the artillery gunners against the intense fire of modern machine, rapid-fire, and high-power guns.

The inventive genius of ordnance and civilian experts has been taxed in designing carriages that would obviate this fault, resulting, it is believed, in the solution of this difficult problem.

The construction of a disappearing carriage for a gun of as great weight and power as the 12-inch had previously been considered a problem too difficult for solution, and the method had been inaugurated of mounting these guns upon hydraulic elevators, to be raised and lowered by steam power for firing over an ordinary parapet and for loading behind its shelter. Two guns were thus mounted at Sandy Hook. But after the successful trials and adoption of the 8-inch and 10-inch carriages, a 12-inch Buffington-Crozier carriage was built, tested, and adopted, replacing the gun-lift mounting for this caliber of gun. In regard to this carriage, the Board of Ordnance and Fortification (Maj. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, president; Col. Royal T. Frank, First United States Artillery; Col. Peter C. Hains, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Maj. Frank H. Phipps, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and Mr. Joseph H. Outhwaite, members) in its report for 1897, stated as follows:

The test of this carriage is nearly completed, and it has proved an unqualified success. The development of this carriage is considered by the board as a decided advance, as it enables the Government to mount its heaviest guns under cover without resorting to such expensive devices as the gun-lift battery and armored turrets, which were considered the only solution of the problem a few years ago.

And again, in its report for 1898:

This carriage was completed at the Watertown Arsenal May 6, 1897. It has since passed a very satisfactory test at the proving ground and has been issued to the service.

Although the system of mounting in gun-lift batteries is much less expensive than the use of turrets, it is still more than twice as costly as the method by the use of disappearing carriages, and as by actual trial the rate of fire with the latter system is five times as great as that with the gun lifts, it is seen that with this system more than ten times the efficiency is obtained than with the gun-lift system.

The price of the three type Buffington-Crozier carriages should be deducted from the cost of the experiments with them, as these carriages are all now in service at fortifications, which none of the carriages of the other types tried are, although considerable sums were afterwards spent upon some of them in the effort to fit them for use. Efforts have been made since the adoption of the Buffington-Crozier carriage to replace it by other types, proposed by parties interested in efforts to supply, for the large profits which would result, these extensively used machines. Two 10-inch carriages have been tested with this object, at a cost, respectively, of $41,620 (second pneumatic) and $55,605.10 (Howell), the experiments being made as a result of special legislation by Congress. The first-mentioned carriage was not accepted, and a measure is pending in Congress for the relief of the parties concerned from their bond for its successful performance and the retention by the Government of the final payment, which has not yet been made.

Congress has also authorized the expenditure of $180,000 for the construction of the Emery carriage for 12-inch gun; of this amount $126,000 has been expended, but the carriage is not yet completed, although its construction was authorized as long ago as the year 1893. Notwithstanding these vigorous efforts, all costly to the Government, of private industry to supersede the type, in the natural effort, and one finding sympathy to substitute something upon which somebody should make a profit for a largely used machine for which the Government pays only manufacturer's earnings, the Buffington-Crozier carriage still retains its supremacy. In time, of course, it will be outbuilt, and it will then be possible to utilize the disappearing principle to still greater advantage.

This history shows the manner in which the subject was regarded at the time when the attention of all concerned with it was most earnestly engaged. It precludes all idea of surprise or lack of cognizant deliberation, and enforces the necessity for at least equal care to precede the admission that such skillfully and laboriously sought conclusions were, after all, in error.

Mr. President, there seems to be no other side to this question, unless we propose to place ourselves in the position of experts, when the Government has educated at West Point and at the Naval Academy and elsewhere people who are competent to pass upon the question. If this Board of Ordnance and Fortification deem it proper, expedient, and advisable and in the interest of the Government to have these disappearing carriages, we ought to acquiesce in their decision, and I am willing to submit the question to the Senate on this proposition and to vote immediately.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think there are other Senators, doubtless, who desire to discuss this matter at length, and under those circumstances we shall be shut out entirely, unless the Senator will kindly yield that we may take up the union-station bill.

Mr. PERKINS. I will certainly agree to vote if we can pass the bill now. This is an appropriation bill of great importance.

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not wish to take more than a minute or two whenever the Senator has concluded.

Mr. PERKINS. I am willing to submit it to a vote; but there are one or two other propositions. My friend read an essay from an Army officer, and he gave it as an authority and wished to have it printed in the RECORD. He forgot to state that the Journal of the Military Service Institution, which is a work of great literary ability and authority upon military affairs, offered a prize to a number of essayists for the best written paper upon disappearing carriages, either for or against it.

Those essays were sent in under anonymous names. As a matter of fact, the paper read by the Senator from Vermont did not win the first prize of a golden medal. It was won by Lieut. E. R. Stuart, who read a paper in favor of disappearing carriages. He is an eminent engineer officer. The second best paper was by Capt. W. R. Hamilton, of the Artillery Corps. It is only fair that those two essays should go into the RECORD to neutralize the essay submitted by the Senator from Vermont. They are both strongly in favor of the disappearing carriage, and they give authorities. I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD with the article offered by my friend from Vermont. He neglected to state that Lieutenant Stuart received the golden prize. Let those two essays also be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The papers referred to are as follows:

GOLD MEDAL PRIZE ESSAY, 1901—ARE DISAPPEARING GUNS ESSENTIAL TO THE EFFICIENT DEFENSE OF OUR SEAPORTS?

[By First Lieut. Edwin R. Stuart, U. S. A., Corps of Engineers.]

PRELIMINARY DISCUSSION.

The fact that the seacoast defenses of all nations comprise guns of all calibers up to a maximum of 12 inches or greater is of itself sufficient evidence of the necessity for the different calibers in an effective defense. The rapidity of fire varies inversely with the caliber, but the decrease is not severely felt until a caliber is reached where it becomes necessary to use mechanical appliances for handling the ammunition. This is the case in calibers beyond the 6-inch, and marks the true division line between the rapid-fire and the heavy gun.

In the smaller calibers the rapidity of fire is so great that any attempt to apply the disappearing principle between shots would so diminish the rate of fire as to greatly reduce the effectiveness of the gun. Furthermore, the number of men necessarily exposed in serving the gun is very small, and they may be sheltered from splinters, machine-gun, and other small projectiles by shields. On account of the fact that the weight of the heavy gun is near the limit that may be maneuvered by hand, a shield furnishing protection to the gun detachment can not be satisfactorily used in this case.

A rapid-fire gun may be provided with some form of eclipsing mount, permitting it to disappear as a target when it can not be effectively used as a weapon. During such period it is wholly protected from all except accidental injury. The device by which this temporary disappearance is accomplished in the balanced pillar mount is so simple as to offer no objection to its use. In the elevated position of the gun it differs in no wise from the ordinary pedestal mounting. This form of mount therefore offers no objection from a mechanical standpoint and will protect from injury until needed such guns of the smaller calibers as can not for any reason take an effective part in the combat. Its advantages can not therefore be contested.

In those calibers requiring mechanical appliances for handling the ammunition, the interval between shots and the consequent exposure of a large gun detachment becomes so great that it is worth while to consider those mounts which will withdraw the gun between shots and allow loading under cover.

The various types of mount that have been used may be classified as casemate, turret, barbette, and disappearing. Of these the casemate and turret mounts are so enormously expensive as to be eliminated from consideration in a defensive system so extensive as that of our seacoasts must necessarily be, except for those special cases of restricted sites where an adequate defense can be provided in no other way, and their adoption is forced regardless of the cost.

For the 8-inch, 10-inch, and 12-inch calibers, the only types of mount available for general use are the barbette and disappearing carriages, and these alone will be considered in this discussion, since one or the other must be used in present defensive constructions and until something more satisfactory than either shall have been developed.

COMPARISON OF TYPES.

Both types of mount are possibly susceptible of improvement, but the present forms of the barbette and disappearing carriages will be considered in the comparison, which to be complete must involve the following points: Accuracy of fire, rapidity of fire, simplicity of mechanism, protection to gun and detachment, the moral and material advantages of concealment, cost.

In making the comparison it is necessary to assume that the guns are the same and that the system of ammunition delivery is capable of delivering ammunition as fast as needed.

ACCURACY OF FIRE.

The range and position finding systems necessary for firing at moving targets will be the same for both types of mount, and the difficulty experienced with each will be the same. The element of accuracy may be compared on the basis of a fixed target at a known range.

The barbette gun may be given any elevation and azimuth, and its errors will be due to causes beyond control in any gun; it is therefore as accurate as it lies within human power to make any weapon.

The disappearing gun, if laid indirectly, may be given any computed azimuth, but errors in azimuth will not be self-detecting, and errors in computation will result in a miss. If a sight be rigidly attached to the carriage at such elevation that the target will be visible, its azimuth laying will be as accurate as that of the barbette gun. This method has been adopted, but involves a slight sacrifice of concealment of gun position. The elevating mechanism may be set to give the piece an elevation corresponding to a given range. The gun will have this elevation when in a certain final position only, since the elevation is continually changing during the upward motion of the gun. This change is slow as the gun approaches the final position, and any variation possible in practice would be small. On account of the greater number of joints in the disappearing carriage errors due to looseness of these joints would be greater than in the barbette gun. The disappearing gun has advantages which act directly to counteract this slight disadvantage in point of accuracy, as will be shown later.

RAPIDITY OF FIRE.

Assuming the ammunition delivered were needed upon the loading platform, the mechanical operations of loading are the same, except that the shot for the barbette gun has to be hoisted by hand a distance corresponding to the total vertical motion of the disappearing gun, and the loading done on a small platform, while the disappearing gun comes down after its discharge, and the operation of loading is conveniently performed.

In a rapidity test of the disappearing gun, 10 shots were fired from an 8-inch gun in twelve minutes and twenty-one seconds, and in fourteen minutes and forty-two seconds from the 10-inch gun. No similar data for the barbette gun has been found, but the report of the Chief of Ordnance for 1900 states that careful tests for rapidity of fire for 10-inch and 12-inch guns show that the rate of fire for the disappearing gun is about double that for the barbette gun, due to the causes previously given.

SIMPLICITY OF MECHANISM.

Excepting the balanced pair comprising the gun levers, gun and counterpoise, every part of the disappearing carriage is duplicated or represented in the barbette gun by a device designed to accomplish the same end. The complexity of mechanism alleged as one of the grave defects inherent to the disappearing carriage is largely one of appearance, and dissolves upon a rigid comparison of the two types of mount.

Each has its base ring, upon which rests a carriage provided with suitable turning gear. Upon this carriage rests upon live rollers in each type a chassis, whose motion is controlled by hydraulic recoil cylinders, with throttling bars, equalizing pipes and the attendant evils fully developed in both. Each has a retracting gear, and an elevating gear, mechanically satisfactory and suited to its purpose in each. On the chassis is mounted the gun in the barbette carriage, and in the disappearing carriage the gun levers, carrying at its extremities the gun and counterweight. No gun lever has ever broken in service; no carriage has failed through the presence of the counterweight, or given any trouble from this source except through carelessness, or mechanical defects corrected in the later types of the disappearing carriage.

Accidents to other parts of the carriage are equally liable to happen to both types. In practice three disappearing carriages have been disabled for service through the bursting of equalizing pipes, but the pressure in the cylinders and equalising pipes of the barbette carriage is very much greater than in the disappearing carriage, and an equal amount of experience with the barbette carriage would show a greater number of failures from this cause. Considerable annoyance has been caused and a number of guns disabled for drill purposes by the breaking of retraction chains, but this was not a serious difficulty, and has been obviated in later carriages by the substitution of wire rope for the retraction of the gun. Each carriage, as all other machines, requires daily attention to keep it in perfect order.

Even if the disappearing carriage be more complex than the barbette carriage, the increase in this respect is far less than in the other details of artillery defense.

No artilleryman advocates the return to a system of defense which would render unnecessary searchlights, electric-light plants, a complicated system of range and position finding, an elaborate system of communication, and a more or less complicated system of ammunition delivery.

Moreover, through the initiative of the artillery, there has been recently transferred to it an adjunct of the defense—the submarine mines, with a large amount of delicate apparatus, a large amount of material which to be effective must be in perfect condition, difficult to install in service and still more difficult to maintain in serviceable condition, requiring technical knowledge and manual skill in marked degree, and involving many situations where errors, mistakes, or the slightest carelessness means disaster.

It is true that the most effective defense requires the submarine mines to be installed and controlled by the artillery commander. The responsibility for this defensive adjunct has been assumed without complaint as to its complexity for the sake of a better defense. If the artillery can not care for the heavy armament on disappearing carriages, a most valuable item of the defense of our seaports has been rendered useless by having been transferred to a branch of the service incapable of installing and maintaining it, for it may be stated without hesitation that men not capable of the degree of instruction necessary to handle successfully the disappearing gun can not be depended upon to install an effective submarine-mine defense. The willing assumption of this defense is evidence of the belief of the artillery in their ability to handle the less complicated disappearing guns.

PROTECTION TO GUN AND DETACHMENT.

The degree of protection required can only be determined by considering the experiences of the past, coupled with experiments made under conditions which are not sufficiently near those of war as to be a true guide. The latter serve only to indicate what may be expected under present conditions of combat where forces are about equally matched.

The bombardment of Alexandria, San Juan, Santiago, the batteries in Manila Bay, and other earlier instances may be cited to show that no material damage can be inflicted upon fortifications or their armament by the guns of a fleet. The degree of protection afforded to guns in barbette mounts appear to meet the requirements of protection to material, even when opposed to modern guns. The same is not true of the gun detachments. Cases may be cited, as at Alexandria, where troops of poor morale have abandoned uninjured guns under the fire of vessels. The inference is irresistible that even troops of good morale will be severely shaken by the fire to which they will be exposed in future attacks on seacoast fortifications, and the service of the gun in rapidity and accuracy will be materially affected by the losses which the bombardments of San Juan and Santiago show that the cannoneers of barbette batteries will suffer.

Interesting in this connection are certain observations of L. Alvarado, a Spanish officer, who participated in the defense of San Juan against the bombardment of May 12, 1898. These are published in a translation in the Journal of the United States Artillery for March and April, 1900. The extracts are as follows:

* * * * * * *

"Third. Barbette batteries need at least 14 to 16 meters elevation. Low barbette batteries, unless in very especial positions, can not be fought if they are attacked with resolution by vessels which use the fire from their tops.

* * * * * * *

"Sixth. Many officers are absolutely necessary in seacoast batteries. * * * They are needed to preserve by their example the coolness and discipline of the men who have to stand firm under a fire from which they can shelter themselves by running only a few meters."

* * * * * * *

It seems useless to cite experimental firing when examples from actual war are available, but the French experimental firing at l'Ile de Levant, in 1896, and the English experimental firing at Inchkeith, about 1885, while showing greater results than were actually obtained later under war conditions, pointed clearly to what might be anticipated and was later realized, and justify citing the experimental firing at a dummy representing the action of a disappearing gun at Portland, in 1885, to show that machine-gun fire can not harm the detachment serving such a gun, while poor practice by the heavy guns showed the demoralizing effect of the want of a definite target.

This firing comprised 6,910 rounds of 1-inch and rifle caliber, 29 rounds from 6-pounders, fired at an average range of about 825 yards, and 15 shell and 13 shrapnel from 10-inch guns at a range of about 2,500 yards. No damage to gun or detachment resulted from this firing. The weather conditions were not favorable, but the officers of the vessel engaged reported that the results would probably have been the same, even under more favorable conditions. Peace practice being more accurate than can be hoped for in war, it is evident that the fire of a fleet can not injure a disappearing gun battery.

THE MORAL AND MATERIAL ADVANTAGES OF CONCEALMENT.

The barbette gun can be rendered inconspicuous by neutral colors, but the advocacy of such measures is an admission of the immense advantage of the total concealment afforded by the disappearing mount. By the use of the latter the enemy has no visual means of determining the strength or location of the defenses. No definite target is presented except during a few seconds insufficient for aiming, and not much greater than the time of flight of the projectiles aimed at it.

Any gun out of ammunition or not actually engaged may be wholly removed from danger of damage by accidental shots by being withdrawn behind its parapet, and any gun slightly injured may be withdrawn and repaired. The disappearing gun has also the advantage of concealing from the attack the nature and extent of any injury to the armament, while any damage to the attacking fleet is at once known to the garrison of the fortifications. The greater circumspection required in the attack of fortifications whose strength and condition remain unknown will result in delay, which will directly favor the fortifications by reason of the greater expenditure of ammunition possible to the latter.

COST.

The approximate cost of the emplacement, gun, and mount for the different calibers is—

8-inch:
Barbette	$55,600
Disappearing	72,000
10-inch:
Barbette	74,200
Disappearing	99,300
12-inch:
Barbette	118,800
Disappearing	141,000

It has been previously shown that the rate of fire of the disappearing gun is about double that of the barbette gun. While information from different sources does not give the same cost for the different types of emplacements, the ratio of cost is about the same, and may be assumed as 3:4 in favor of the barbette gun. The actual cost of installation for a given intensity of fire is therefore in the proportion of 2:3 in favor of the disappearing gun. To deliver the same volume of fire from barbette guns would require double the number of gun detachments. Since a certain intensity of fire is the consideration governing any project for defense, the relative cost of obtaining this intensity of fire by the use of the different types of mount is of interest, and would be as follows:

Four 8-inch barbette guns can be mounted for about $222,400. These guns (assuming double the time quoted in the rapidity test of the disappearing gun) could fire 4 shots every two minutes and twenty-eight seconds, or 96 shots per hour for the 4 guns Three 8-inch disappearing guns can be mounted for $216,000. These guns can fire 3 shots every one minute and fourteen seconds, or 135 shots per hour for the 3 guns.

The ability to fire 96 shots per hour from 8-inch guns, rating interest at 3 per cent, represents an annual outlay of $6,600 and requires 4 gun detachments of about 10 men each. The annual cost of each gun detachment is about $3,000, counting the pay and rations of each soldier at an average of $25 per month. The total annual expenditure representing the ability to fire 96 shots per hour is therefore $18,600. The annual cost per shot per hour from 8-inch barbette guns is therefore approximately $194.

On the same basis, three disappearing guns, representing the ability to fire 135 shots per hour, involve an outlay of $15,480, or approximately $115 per shot per hour for the disappearing guns. The annual cost of maintaining an effective defense using barbette guns will therefore be nearly 1.7 times as great as for an equally effective defense using the disappearing guns.

This relative annual cost will vary with the absolute numerical strength of the garrisons maintained, but will always be decidedly in favor of the disappearing gun.

SUMMARY.

For rapid-fire guns, the ability to disappear when not needed is obtained by means so simple as to offer no objection to the use of a type of carriage which gives the ability to do so.

For heavy guns, the disappearing carriage secures at less cost per annum all the advantages of concealment and protection to gun and the detachment serving it, by the use of a mechanism apparently complex and liable to get out of order, and involving a slight sacrifice of theoretical accuracy. The complexity of mechanism exists largely in appearance, since a rigid comparison of the barbette and disappearing carriages shows all the dangerous elements of complexity to be equally existent in both, and the hydraulic pressure in the cylinders and equalizing pipes greater in the barbette than in the disappearing carriage. The most serious accidents that have happened to the disappearing carriages so far have been due to the bursting of the equalizing pipes, an accident more liable to happen to the barbette carriage than to the disappearing.

The sacrifice in theoretical accuracy in the disappearing carriage is more than compensated by the protection afforded to the gun detachment, which will allow the service of the gun to proceed without the demoralization incident to the losses which experience shows must be suffered by the detachments serving barbette guns.

For a smaller first cost, and a smaller annual expenditure, the disappearing gun will protect our seaports in time of war as efficiently as the barbette gun, and return to their homes at its close many men whose lives would be sacrificed if exposed in the open emplacements of barbette guns. An effective defense must be provided, but that can be accomplished by the use of disappearing guns, and the Government owes it to its defenders that their lives shall not be needlessly sacrificed.

The installation of guns on disappearing carriages in the past has been based upon sound principles, and the best defense of our seacoast requires that it shall be continued.

CRUSTACEAN.

ARE DISAPPEARING GUNS ESSENTIAL TO THE EFFICIENT DEFENSE OF OUR SEAPORTS?

[By Capt. William R. Hamilton, U. S. A., Artillery Corps.]

The defense of the coast is sought by means of the offensive action of ships of war, primarily; by the defensive action of guns in fortifications on the land, secondarily; or by a combination of the two. In our country we must perforce use both means, and the subject of coast defense should therefore be divided into two parts, viz:

1. Mobile defense, or that of war ships.
2. Stationary defense, or that of fortifications.

Under the first head belong all classes of war ships operated by sailors, and designed to carry offensive action wherever necessary. Under this head are included not only battle ships, cruisers, torpedo boats, but transports for troops and munitions of war also. From their very nature they must act on the offensive to be successful; i. e., they can not be tied down to single ports or harbors.

Under the second head belong the fortifications located on the coast, their guns, submarine mines, and all accessories designed to defend against attack of harbors, channels, or other valuable or strategic place on the dividing line between the sea and shore. Necessarily from their nature, they are tied down to the locality in which they are located, and their sphere of action is limited to the effective range of their guns.

Both these classes are absolutely necessary in our country, and neither possesses any relative importance above the other. To maintain and extend our commerce and trade, to punish insulters in foreign seas, to cause our flag to be respected on distant shores, a navy is necessary. But battle ships require dockyards and arsenals and storehouses, and commerce and trade builds up large and important cities on the coast, and to offer harbors of refuge for ships, protect and defend dockyards, arsenals, and cities, fortifications are just as necessary. In an article on "The war on the sea and its lessons," Captain Mahan says:

"It is proper here to say, for the remark is pertinent and most important, that coast defenses and naval force are not interchangeable things; neither are they opponents, one of the other, but complementary. The one is stationary, the other mobile; and however perfect in itself either may be, the other is necessary to its completeness. In different nations the relative consequences of the two may vary. In Great Britain, whose people are fed from the outside world, the need for a fleet vastly exceeds that for coast defenses. With us, able to live off ourselves, there is more approach to parity. Men may even differ as to which is the more important; but such difference in this question, which is purely military, is not according to knowledge.

"In equal amounts mobile offensive power is always and under all conditions more effective to the ends of war than stationary defensive power. Why, then, provide the latter? Because mobile force, whatever shape it takes, ships or men, is limited narrowly as to the weight it can bear; whereas stationary force generally being tied to the earth is restricted generally in the same direction only by the ability of the designer to cope with the conditions. Given a firm foundation, which practically can always be had, and there is no limit to the amount of the armor, mere defensive outfit, be it wood, stone, bricks, or iron, that you can erect upon it; neither is there any limit to the weight of guns—the offensive element—that the earth can bear, only they will be motionless guns.

"The power of a steam navy to move is practically unfettered; its ability to carry weight, whether guns or armor, is comparatively very small. Fortifications, on the contrary, have almost unbounded power to bear weight, whereas their power to move is nil; which again amounts to saying that, being chained, they can put forth offensive power only at arm's length, as it were.

"Thus stated, it is seen that these two elements of sea warfare are in the strictest sense complementary, one possessing what the other has not, and that the difference is fundamental, essential, unchangeable, not accidental or temporary. Given local conditions which can be found, greater power, defensive and offensive, can be established in permanent works than can be brought to the spot in fleets. When, therefore, circumstances permit ships to be squarely pitted against fortifications—not merely to pass swiftly by them—it is only because the builders of the shore works have not for some reason, possibly quite adequate, given them the power to repel attack which they might have had. It will not be asserted that there are no exceptions to this, as to most general rules, but as a broad statement it is almost universally true."

* * * * * * *

"Thus deficient coast protection reacts unfavorably upon the war fleet, which in all its movements should be free from any responsibility for the mere safety of the ports it quits." * * *

In short, if war fleets can leave the home ports knowing that they are effectively protected by the shore defenses they can act in turn effectively, well knowing that which is left behind is well protected, and that in case of mishap either by battle or elements they have a safe refuge to which to flee for refitting and arming again for renewed battle.

From the very nature of the subject of this essay there is no need of any discussion of the mobile coast defence, except so far as to consider what may be brought against guns ashore. We will therefore conclude this part of the subject by remarking that the ideal defense of a coast is a vast naval fleet, so superior in strength, numbers, skill, and armament against any combination of fleets that might be brought against us that it would not only cover all our harbors, channels, etc., with a sufficient number of vessels to adequately protect them, but leave a still further number to act offensively in any part of the world.

And such a fleet would be so costly, both in initiating and maintenance, that it would soon bankrupt the nation, and therefore would not be tolerated even in thought. The defense of our coasts rests in the fortifications, the guns therein, and the mines of adjacent waters. All discussion in this essay refers entirely to the fortifications erected on the coast line of the United States, and assuming this condition, we pass on to the query: What is seacoast defense? And, following closely in its train, will naturally come the following queries: Where are such defenses placed, and what condition govern their location, and strength, and character? Upon the character of the special defense determined depends the nature and strength of the armament, and when we have proceeded thus far we are then ready to discuss understandingly the guns and mounts required for thorough efficiency for the desired work.

By coast defense is understood all means of war used to protect the maritime frontiers of our country, with the special duty of guarding all approaches to rivers and harbors and other channels whose possession would be of value to an enemy and a loss to us. This defense comprises fortifications with emplacements for both large and small guns and all means of obstructing channels and of working guns and mines both by night and day. Its special object is to prevent attack directly by war ships or attack by bombardment, and while a proper prudence will dictate also means to prevent attack by landing parties and by land, yet the actual landing of a body of troops of sufficient size to do any considerable damage is so remote a contingency, is fraught with so much danger to the attackers, and attended with so many difficulties that we may dispense with it in this discussion. Hence all attack will be considered as coming from the sea.

WHERE ARE SEACOAST DEFENSES PLACED?

The United States has a maritime frontier of about 5,000 miles on the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific. This does not include Alaska, the Great Lakes, or our new possessions in either the West Indies or the East. The coast of the Gulf States and those bordering the Atlantic as far north as New York presents few harbors of sufficient depth to admit heavy war vessels. It is a low-lying, sandy coast, with the majority of its cities and towns somewhat removed from the coast proper, but from New York northward the character changes to one of bold and high eminences, with many good harbors and channels sufficiently deep to admit the heaviest battle ships to the very wharves of the many populous cities on its shore. On the Pacific the line is even bolder, and guarded almost to its edge by mountains. Here few harbors are found, but they are deep and commodious. Quoting from General Abbot on this subject, we find that—

"Upon the whole extent of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts there are about 30 ports which demand local protection for their cities, now exposed to occupation and destruction, and of these about a dozen are so important as centers of commercial wealth that the entire country has much at stake in their security. Nine out of this number are also important as containing naval stations and depots of supply, without which our new ships of war would be unable to keep the sea or perform any service in war; for it must not be forgotten that naval bases are as indispensable in these days of steam as are bases of supplies for armies in the field. In fact, this statement hardly puts the matter strongly enough, for our new ships of war would be exposed to capture and use against us, if they should attempt to operate on their natural element, the ocean, without ports of refuge in which to find security when overmatched.

"Besides these 30 ports now urgently demanding protection there are about 70 others whose local importance would justify inexpensive earthworks." * * * "In fine, our true policy for coast defense is to fortify the chief ports along our coasts, so as not only to protect the chief cities and arsenals against insult but also to provide safe refuges for our coastwise marine and safe naval bases with coaling stations, depots of supply, and places of refuge for our ships of war when threatened by superior forces on the ocean, whence they may issue to act offensively as circumstances permit."

Works of coast defense are therefore required to—

(1) Prevent passage of war fleets through narrow channels that would enable them to successfully attack cities and important places.

(2) Prevent the bombardment of cities and important works from beyond our outside.

(3) Prevent the occupation of harbors or the passage of channels, which without having cities or important works located on them, may nevertheless lead to landlocked bays, sounds, or rivers. Wherever any of the foregoing conditions exist there should be placed coast-defense works, which with their armaments will vary according to surrounding local conditions.

What conditions govern the location, strength, and character of coast-defense works?

The location of works must depend upon the vicinity of the city, arsenal, harbor, or other place it is built to defend, upon the nature of the terrain or ground, upon the width, depth, and form of channel, harbor, or other waters from which an enemy may issue, and upon local conditions of climate, storms, soil, etc.

In choosing the location for coast works we are obliged to consider the commercial and political development of the port it is to defend, which may or may not become a strategic point, necessitating the building of a stronghold, though not well adapted to defense. Commercial development has caused many cities to spread out beyond the original boundaries desired for them, and in fact in some instances military development has brought about this very end, so that close to the fort or battery is a part of the town or city. This did not matter a half century ago, when means of attack were limited to ranges that could be easily calculated by the eye, but in these days of accurate long-range guns we often find, almost upon the coast, great and important commercial works built for trade and commerce, but unsuited for defense.

Still such defense can not be dispensed with, and to keep a fleet from bombarding such a location makes another difficulty in building a proper defense work. Thus the vicinity or proximity of the city, arsenal, or port has a very important bearing on the location of the defense works. If the waters of the channel to be covered by the works is a narrow, tortuous one, or shallow, or filled with shoals or rocks, it may also be easily understood that only lighter vessels would attempt to force such a passage, and they being in general armed with lighter guns, it follows that the location of the works would have to be considered with reference to such fire as an enemy could bring upon the works. Again, the entrance of the channel may be lofty and bold, so that a few guns placed upon the summits would entirely bar the passage of vessels; or, it may be low or even covered with water, as a shoal, etc., all of which will have an important bearing on the proper and best location of the defense works.

Fortunately with us there are few important cities outside of those on the Great Lakes that are built directly upon the shore, and our engineers have been able to find in all places, so far, advanced sites for locations of all necessary defenses.

The character of coast defenses must depend generally upon the nature of attack to be expected (Abbot), and specifically upon local conditions. If danger is anticipated of attack by land, or of an immense army debarking on land, then works must be constructed as to withstand not only attack from the sea, but from the land also. This latter condition necessitates provision for sustaining prolonged sieges and bombardments. Such a condition we do not, as before remarked, consider possible in this country. Hence, as we may anticipate attack by sea only, our coast works are built accordingly.

In order that the greatest amount of fire may be concentrated on any one unit of an opposing fleet, and at the same time the enemy be compelled to scatter his fire, our works must be built in a number of detached batteries, widely spaced, and as far as possible concealed. Such batteries will rarely have more than four guns of heavy caliber or less than two. They must be properly flanked and such disposition made of rapid-fire guns as will not only insure their use as flanking guns, but also for the more important rôle of covering mine fields and the closer water approaches. Local conditions will determine not only the specific character, but also the strength of the works or batteries. All authorities on this subject lay down the general principle that coast-defense works are built for (1) preventing passage of war fleets, (2) preventing bombardment of cities, arrenals, etc., (3) preventing occupation of channels, land-locked bays, wide-mouthed harbors, etc. The two methods of coast science adapted for this prevention are the use of high-power guns and the obstruction of channels by mines or other obstacles.

It is in the proper selection of sites for his guns that the engineer finds his greatest difficulties and has his greatest opportunities of displaying his professional abilities. The general topography of a location will exert a governing influence on the character of the work to be erected, and, inasmuch as the armament in turn depends upon the nature of the work as well as other conditions to be discussed later, it is opportune here to discuss more in detail the influence of site upon the nature of works and their armaments.

It may be remarked, first, that in selecting a site the engineer has the great advantage, not possessed by the enemy, of indicating his own battlefield and building on it accordingly. On this point we again quote General Abbot:

"A land fortress chosen in advance may usually be passed, and the battle be forced beyond reach of its guns. On the approaches to a land-locked water route nature provides only a few channels where ships can move, and that particular site for defense can be chosen by the engineer where they will operate under the maximum disadvantages, and yet where they must certainly pass to effect their object. This is the answer to the common fallacy urged by advocates of floating batteries, that land guns are chained monsters, while guns afloat may be shifted to meet the enemy wherever he appears. This argument fails doubly. He should be compelled to fight where we have every possible advantage, and the guns should be sure to be in position when wanted.

"Mobility implies the possibility that they may be drawn away by the skilled maneuvers of the enemy and the channel be left uncovered at the critical moment. Moreover, a land armament is not exposed to ramming or torpedo attack, while a coast-defense fleet is as likely to suffer in this manner as the enemy himself. * * * To forbid to an enemy the occupation of a harbor useful for his purposes is a simple operation. It only requires few modern mortars in a battery suitably designed to facilitate accuracy of fire and well protected against the operations of a landing party. Should we become possessed of foreign coaling stations, this plan, with appropriate local modifications, would probably meet all needs."

(It is more than seven years ago that General Abbot wrote his article, and since then his prophecies have been strangely verified. The full and complete experiments at Preble, Me., last fall, have demonstrated thoroughly the value and reliability of mortars, while the number of coaling stations now possessed by the United States is beginning to circle the earth.) "The increased range of modern ordnance has rendered possible a somewhat new application of land batteries to the defense of the coast. There are certain entrances to large inland waters, like Long Island Sound and Puget Sound, which are too wide to be properly closed with land defenses alone, especially as the depth and strength of the current forbid the effective use of submarine mines. Here there will be great advantage in reenforcing land fortifications with armored coast-defense vessels and torpedo boats." * * *

The elevation or site of a coast-defense work determines in all cases to a certain extent, and in many to a very great extent, the nature of the arm to be used, its caliber, and kind of mount. Hence it is necessary to study it carefully. In a most interesting and authoritative article on the "Elevation of Sites for Batteries," Maj. J. G. D. Knight, Engineer Corps, deduces as a result of many examples the conclusion that it is not probable that a naval attack on land batteries will be entered upon at distances exceeding 5,000 yards. The article in question was written six years ago, and later developments occurring during the Spanish-American war make it conclusively certain that attacks on land batteries can not be opened at ranges exceeding 3,000 yards with any degree of effectiveness, except in the one case where a fleet may lay at anchor and attempt from a long range to bombard the work.

This, however, is the one case that shore authorities consider as least fraught with danger or harm. In other words, the danger to be feared by such bombardment on a city, dockyard, or harbor densely occupied, at ranges exceeding 5,000 yards, is nil, and an enemy would not be justified in expending the large amount of ammunition necessary to consummate it, except in the one case where he was really executing a diversion or attempting to keep the shore batteries so occupied as to lead them from his real objects of attack. Major Knight presents two tables which are quoted herein, giving the angles of fall of projectiles of 8-inch and 10-inch United States Army guns and the 40-centimeter Krupp gun, all rifled breech-loaders, as computed from the tables of curves of the engineer board. The second table gives the heights at different ranges, giving corresponding reductions of the angles of fall of arriving projectiles, with the corresponding increase of protection (vertical) of loading detachments at 45 feet in rear of the crest of the parapet, and on a level of the loading platforms:

TABLE I.

*Elevation above ship's guns.

From the foregoing tables, remembering that effective ranges are not beyond 5,000 yards, it follows that guns mounted on the Buffington-Crozier carriages, after recoil, the gun not being fired with an angle of depression, lies wholly below a plane which passing through the interior crest is depressed 7 degrees. This plane passes 5 feet 11 inches above the front edge of the loading platform and 4 feet 3 inches above the rear edge of loading platform. Now, according to the table the greatest angle of fall for projectiles for a range of 5,000 yards is given by Table I as 6.1 degree. It follows, therefore, that since the rear of the gun when drawn from battery, that is, when in its loading position, is less than 5 feet above the platform, that neither gun nor carriages will be struck by projectiles passing above the interior crests.

This is good for all ranges of 5,000 yards or less, and even where the crest of the land battery is on the same level of the attacking naval battery. Since the chances of projectiles striking just above or grazing the interior crest are almost nil, it follows that the protection afforded men serving the gun is ample. They are almost entirely covered. So also will the same be apparent with guns mounted on the gun-lift disappearing principle. But where guns are mounted in barbette—that is, on nondisappearing carriages—both guns and carriages and necessarily also the loading detachments, being above the level of the interior crests, are exposed as plainly to the enemy's fire as if on sandy beach without any parapets in front of them.

Although the danger from fire is little in the cases just cited, still, there being some, we next inquire by the second table what effect the elevation of the site will have on the fire. Major Knight calls this "the searching effect of projectiles and the elevation of site that will neutralize this effect." As we increase the elevation of a site the angle of depression for its guns must also increase until finally, when with the 8-inch gun, the angle of depression is 5°, the platform of the gun is relatively 11 inches higher to the interior crest than when the gun is fired without depression, while with the 10-inch gun it is 12.5 inches.

Of course, when vessels are 2,000 yards or more distant, no moderate increase of elevation will give corresponding increase in protection. Hence, by Table II, a vessel 1,000 yards away firing at a battery that is 262 feet high above sea-level, since the protection at 5° depression is but 35 inches and 36 inches, respectively, for 8-inch and 10-inch guns at 45 feet in rear of crest, this protection being the net increase, it is seen that there is but little chance of hitting any of the detachment, even on extreme rear edge of platform. But if the range be double or more then the crest elevation should also be increased in like ratio, so as not to obtain more than 36 inches increase. This is evident since each increase in elevation of interior crest requires the loading platform also to be raised so much nearer the level of the crest that the required angles of depression may be obtained.

Were this not so, there would be between the walls of the battery and the nearest spot the projectiles of its guns would strike the water a dead space, much out of proportion to the increase of elevation. A projectile, by Table II, having an angle of fall of 1° and clearing the interior crest will, at a distance of 45 feet from crest, pass 9 inches below the level of the crest when fired at a range of 1,000 yards. For ranges of 2,000 yards the angle of fall will be 2°, and projectiles will pass 19 inches below the crest, and to neutralize this fall the elevation of the site must be 210 feet. When a projectile is fired from 5,000 yards and has an angle of fall of 5° it will pass 47 inches below the crest, and to neutralize this the site must be over 1,000 feet high. But while by raising the site we have gained a great protection to guns and detachment, we have also gained in the searching power of the guns. A 10-inch rifle whose interior crest is 300 feet high will have a dead zone of 1,000 yards radius, but if we raise the same gun to 210 feet elevation, then the dead zone becomes 720 yards radius.

Major Knight asserts that a gun mounted on either of the three disappearing plans—the gun-lift, Buffington-Crozier, and Gordon carriages—will not be directly hit when under direct fire of guns at ranges not exceeding 5,000 yards, and therefore that the additional protection is slight and really unnecessary for guns so mounted, and is practically nothing for nondisappearing barbette guns. Also, that increase of site increases dead zones, and therefore that moderate elevations are best. Furthermore, the loading platforms of barbette guns on nondisappearing carriages being on practically the same level as the interior crests, no elevation of site affords commensurate shelter to gun, mount, or detachment. There is one advantage gained by elevation of site for disappearing guns, which he distinctly mentions, and that is expressed by him as follows:

"With nothing but the parapet continuously in the enemy's view, with guns appearing only for brief periods, he must be at a loss how to direct (the enemy) his fire if he can not see the openings into which the gun disappears. Therefore, with the view of depriving an enemy of a definite target for his guns, the battery may well be constructed at sufficient elevation to hide the openings of its emplacements from view from the tops of an enemy's vessel. For this purpose, and for this only, it may be well to give crests of batteries an elevation of about 100 feet above the water."

But are there not disadvantages of low sites, which would make necessary the higher elevation? It is claimed that a low site enables the ships to dispense with high angles of fire, for which their decks and gun mounts are not fitted, and it is further said that a low mount on shore does not enable the shore gun to throw a fire on the deck of a ship which as well known is her most vulnerable point. Again it is claimed that a low site gives to the naval attack a distinct advantage, placing its guns on an equality with the shore guns as to energy of impact. For the first objection it may be said that for the same ranges the angles of fall of ship guns is increased but very slightly over those of the shore guns.

Against the second point, it is well known that ships have been unable to give angles of elevation of over 14° or 15° to their guns, while for the third, an example taken from Ingalls's Handbook of Exterior Ballistics may fully answer. Thus a 714-pound shot fired from a ship at a range of 3,000 yards, at an elevation of 1,270 feet, while another fired from the battery at the 1,270-foot elevation, with same weight projectile, the striking velocities would be 1,474 and 1,517 feet, respectively, while the respective striking energies would be 10,754 and 11,360 foot-tons, or the vessel would have but 606 tons handicap. In other words, the shore gun has gained but 3 per cent of energy by reason of elevation, and since a blow of 11,000 foot-tons would not damage at that distance the steel deck of a ship, it is hardly probable that an addition of 400 foot-tons would enable it to do so. Major Knight sums up his splendid article as follows:

"Assuming that vessels will not attack shore batteries at greater ranges than 5,000 yards, barbette guns mounted according to the United States disappearing methods need no additional protection derived from increasing the elevation of battery sites within reasonable limits. Even moderate elevations of batteries, which are armed with guns limited to depressions of 5°, entail dead zones of magnitude not to be overlooked where these zones include areas of deep water. Disappearing guns gain but little additional protection by such increase in the battery elevation, and nondisappearing guns gain practically no additional protection."

Notwithstanding these excellent arguments, the writer of this essay, being an artilleryman, is not prepared to coincide with the conclusions. The fact is admitted that site gives additional invisibility to the guns on shore, for every foot of elevation is a most distinct and valuable advantage when applied to the disappearing guns. But in addition it must be said that every foot of height gained renders the gun more accurate, by reason of the target being virtually larger, while at the same time deck attack is easier and more certain. Beyond this, where elevations for batteries are low, those for the depression range finders of the respective batteries must also be low, and therefore the errors from this source must increase. Ranging of guns is not possible by any system of depression range finding where the vertical base is under 50 feet, and accuracy can not be depended on absolutely till the height is at least 90 feet.

So far, no horizontal range finder has been adopted that will satisfy all artillery conditions so thoroughly as the depression instruments. High sites for fire commanders, and battery commanders' stations are almost a necessity, since ships can be sighted at greater ranges, and preparations for fighting them made accordingly. Thus, at a height of 600 feet in clear weather, the water line of a vessel is visible, with a good glass, a distance of 20 miles, and smoke coming from the same vessel is visible 10 miles farther. If the vessel is coming on at a 14-knot speed, this will allow two hours to prepare for it. Modern guns have much flatter trajectories than our old muzzle-loaders, yet in the heyday of their existence those on Porter's fleets could not damage the guns of the Confederate batteries at Port Hudson and Vicksburg, although the elevation of these latter was about 100 feet. The flatter the trajectory the less the angle of fall, and hence modern guns at short ranges can not attain the rear of parapets of moderate height, while the higher the site the greater must the range of the ship be to do any damage to the works or detachments back of the shore batteries.

The high site is not so easily rushed by shore or landing parties. That the target becomes greater the higher we ascend is readily seen, since the beam of a ship is always greater than its freeboard, and while we lose but little of the latter, we gain much of the former. But that elevation affects the errors of aiming or firing is not so plain. If we suppose a gun fired at any given range at a target on the same level with it, and presume the shot to pass 50 yards beyond the target, it is evident that, raising the gun 50 feet and firing under exactly the same conditions as before, the shot must strike so much nearer the target, since with the same charge of powder and the same conditions, the range of the shot is exactly the same. Now, since the most important thing about seacoast firing is to obtain accurate ranges, and since range finders and instruments used in communicating ranges may give out at a critical moment, it can not be doubted that the elevation of a site when high will give to the shore greater advantages than when low. In conclusion, we may sum up that a high site is always to be chosen, provided the area of fire covered by its batteries is not restricted thereby.

In placing guns in a battery chosen there are two main objectives to bear in mind. The first is that guns are placed there to prevent vessels from passing by—in other words, to fire at vessels in motion.

The second one is that they are placed there to prevent bombardments—that is, to fire at vessels at anchor.

In the first case, vessels may run by without firing or they may pass in keeping up a systematic attack on the fort. In the second case, vessels may anchor at close range in the hope of crushing or silencing the forts by a systematic attack and heavy fire or they may anchor at long range and bombard while other ships attempt to pass by, thus hoping to draw the fire of the batteries on shore; or, at any range, they may attempt to crush the shore batteries by a heavy fire.

Bearing these two objectives in mind, we readily understand, then, that guns are distributed according to their class and caliber as follows:

First. At those points where navigation is most difficult for any enemy, the most effective fire must be brought to bear.

Second. To render the position of a ship untenable, we must cover with an effective fire, all waters in which she could lie and do any damage either to the shore batteries, to shipping in the harbor, to dockyards, cities, etc. In some cases one condition must yield to the other, and then the first must be supreme, but in the majority of cases, the two may be combined. These are tactical questions that do not come within the scope of this essay. The guns having been generally determined upon, then follows the question of their mounts, and as this is really the subject-matter of this essay, all that has been written so far, being necessary to lead up to it in an understanding manner, we must first lay down the different systems of mounting guns.

The various classes of mounts for heavy guns may be classed under three heads, viz:

1. Where complete protection is afforded both gun and its carriage and detachment, except for the brief moment the gun is exposed while firing, and limited only by the size of port through which it is withdrawn.

2. Protection to carriage and detachment at all times against direct fire and to gun, except for brief moment of firing. This method exposes gun and detachment to vertical fire.

3. Varying protection against direct fire by shields, etc. No overhead cover.

Maj. G. S. Clarke, R. E., gives as separate groups of the three classes thus named the following subdivisions:

CLASS I.

1. Shielded casemates. 2. Curved-front shielded casemates. 3. Continuous iron front. 4. Gruson battery. 5. Nonrecoil gun. 6. Turret. 7. Compound armor cupola. 8. Gruson turret.

CLASS II.

1. Open battery with shields. 2. Open battery with earth embrasures. 3. Barbettes. 4. Light cupolas. 5. Breech hoods with barbette guns. 6. Barbette with turntable and horizontal splinter roof shield; loading performed at elevation, the breech being depressed through an opening in the shield.

CLASS III.

1. Moncrieff counterweight carriages. 2. Hydropneumatic carriage. 3. Counterbalance disappearing carriage. 4. Floating platform. 5. Balance pillar.

The names given the foregoing classes of mounts very generally explain their manner of action. In the United States our old forts very generally follow in their casemate protection the groups 1 and 2 of Class I. Turrets have been suggested for certain of our fortifications, and this part of the subject will again be touched upon. The special advantages claimed for this class of gun mounting are complete protection to mounting and detachment against the heaviest projectiles, limited only by thickness of shield adopted, strength of masonry, and size of fort; also complete protection against high-angle fire, and except at the embrasure in front, against machine-gun fire and shrapnel; generally requires the occurrence of several hits in a small area to produce much result; closest approximation to armor-clads; with the turrets and cupolas, the curvature is generally unfavorable to projectiles, and makes small target.

The general disadvantages of the class are to keep within bounds of moderate cost, entails the crowding of guns, which is always undesirable. For casemates, generally, the target often is large and exposure increased by massive overhead protection. Liable to cumulative danger at long range, and is most effectively attacked by the same projectiles which the ship requires to engage armor clads. Field of view is restricted by small size of port, and a single shell entering is sure to disable carriage. Elevation and depression is limited. With turrets, a single segment broken, an entire turret is hopelessly disabled. Moreover, they are excessively costly. A great deal of complicated machinery is necessary in the turrets, while within space is cramped.

Under Class II come the varying subdivisions of barbettes, which may be found in the United States in all the old styles of water batteries, and the upper tiers of batteries in the masonry forts.

The advantages derived from this class are, first, the great economy over other methods; all-around fire and, where hoods or shields are used, protection against machine guns and small calibered rapid-fire gun-fire; simplicity in mountings, making manipulation of carriage easier; capable of any elevation, and depression limited only by slope of parapet. The disadvantages of this class are that the gun is at all times more or less exposed; no overhead covering, and detachment and carriage exposed. In the turntable barbettes as great and intricate machinery is required as in the turrets. Guns and carriages increase the target offered to the enemy.

The Class III comprises the various forms of disappearing gun carriages. The advantages claimed are protection to gun, carriage, and detachment, except to the former at the moment of firing. Can be rendered by smokeless powder practically invisible, and when degree of protection and range of fire is considered, they are economical mounts. All loading, elevating, and traversing done is always under cover, and is particularly well suited to guns on low sites; allowing great field of fire and angle of elevation and depression, limited only by slope of parapet. The disadvantages stated are, first, the constant and special care required in maintenance in good and serviceable condition, danger from overhead fire, complicated machinery, and danger of being disabled by splinters, and even dust, sand, etc.

A study of the foregoing systems will result in bringing down the various classes to the three simple ones of, first, casemate mounts; second, open barbette mounts; third, disappearing barbette mounts. Taken in this order, they are all in use to-day in the United States, and while the various subdivisions of turrets, cupolas, etc., are suggested, they have not had so far any test of experience or use. As against wrought iron or steel plates, we can calculate with accuracy the result of shots of given weights and velocities, and our experience in the civil war has given us greater knowledge of the effect of shot on earthen parapets, perhaps, than is the case with other nations.

But beyond all question the results of the wars of the past decade, the revolutions in Brazil, the Japanese-Chinese war, the Spanish-American war, and the Chinese war, have most conclusively proved that seacoast guns mounted behind any kind of parapets are practically safe from the fire of naval guns. The magnificent fleets of the American Navy in overpowering numbers at Juan, at Santiago, and other Cuban ports directed well-aimed fire at old earthen and masonry embankments, constructed a century ago, and succeeded only in silencing for the time being the fire of the old Spanish guns, few in number and poorly served. On the cessation of the American fire the Spanish artillery invariably resumed action with their guns, they and their detachments having been unhurt, the only damage done the guns and mounts being exposed barbettes.

To understand the requirements of carriages for heavy guns it is necessary to study each particular kind or class of mounts in the order given. Taking up the first class of mounts—the casemate—under this head we may include, also, the turret and armored casemate, proposed for use in the United States. The revolving-turret system is proposed for use on sea-level sites, and for guns of the heaviest calibers. They will be used where the field of fire is very extended. Of necessity the carriages are low and resemble, in many respects, naval gun mounts. Owing to the great cost of turret, armor, and machinery, the interior size of the turrets are restricted, and while not so much so as in the case of turrets on ships, yet the land gun, being generally heavier and larger, makes the amount of inside space as little.

The Collingwood turret, used in England, mounts two heavy guns, which are in barbette. The carriages are hydropneumatic ones, and rest on a steel deck or floor, which revolves as a turntable. The walls of the turret are fixed, and inclined to the horizon, and this gives greater chance for obliquity of impact of projectiles. Overhead protection is sought for by means of a steel deck, through which is an opening for raising and lowering the guns. This leaves the gun and mount practically without any overhead protection, and the advantages of the system on a low site would be thus rendered nil, when taken in connection with the cost. The Gruson turret system proposed for low sites, like that of Romer Shoals in New York Harbor, has the distinct advantage of complete protection, limited only by thickness of armor. But in addition to its great cost it is extremely doubtful if the great mass of steel and machinery can be made to revolve and work without trouble. All machinery gives more or less trouble, and it is generally at the critical moment that it fails.

The charges of powder and weight of projectiles are so tremendous in modern guns that the effect of recoil can hardly be imagined, and smooth working of machinery that is always underneath, and therefore more subject to the effects of recoil than in any other direction, can not be absolutely calculated beforehand. The special advantage of this turret mounting, so far as the gun and carriage are concerned, is that it is traversed independently of the gun carriage and furnishes an all-around fire. When area of site is restricted by it, we can place in the smaller space the maximum offensive power.

For all casemate carriages there must be two motions, one vertical and the other horizontal. General Abbot states that in the armored casemates the field of fire is restricted to 15° in the first and to 60° in the second. This is the case with the old-style carriages we use in our casemates to-day. In an armored casemate, by using a carriage similar to that used in turrets, the elevation can be increased; but in that case more or less trouble would ensue as a result of increasing the horizontal field of fire. The various varieties of casemate carriages have many advantages, which, however, may be summed up in the one of affording complete cover to carriage and detachment.

In the second class the open-barbette mounts are included, all methods of mounting where the gun, carriage, and detachment are exposed, wholly or nearly so, both to overhead and direct fire. The great merit of this class is their economy of cost, ease of working, and simplicity of construction. Necessarily they can not be used on low sites, but reach their maximum working points on higher sites, where their elevation makes it difficult for hostile shots to reach them. Breech-loading guns have increased the chances of cover afforded to gunners in barbette mountings, since cannoneers are not needed at the muzzle but at the rear of the gun, and although they are more liable to being reached by curved fire there, yet they are also more covered by the gun itself.

But guns mounted in this way are always exposed, and therefore are targets for an enemy's fire. On low sites there is no doubt but the powerful fire of rapid-fire guns of a fleet would smother that of the shore batteries, and thus render, for the time being, the latter useless.

The third class, the disappearing system, comprises with us the two forms of the gun-lift carriage and the Buffington-Crozier carriage. The balance-pillar mount, the Driggs-Schroeder mount, etc., of rapid guns partake more of the open-barbette system, since in action they are loaded and fired in an exposed position. By the disappearing method—which our Artillery Drill most directly calls a class of the barbette system—the parapet affording protection is necessarily fixed and immovable in position. With the gun-lift the gun and carriage and platform on which they stand are moved upward by hydraulic power to the firing position, and sink again by the same power to the loading position under cover of the walls.

In the Buffington-Crozier class the platform remains fixed, as also the greater part of the carriage, and always under cover. When loaded and laid, the gun is elevated above the parapet and it and part of the carriage are exposed for the small instant of time necessary to fire the gun. Its recoil throws it back to the loading position under cover. The whole of the personnel remaining under cover at all times, and as explained herein some pages back, they are protected ever against curved fire and practically unexposed. Against overhead fire, there is no protection beyond that afforded by the elevation of the crest. The gun-lift has, under recent action of the Ordnance and Fortification Board, been practically condemned, so that the only system of disappearing carriages used in the United States service is the Buffington-Crozier carriage.

A mature consideration of the foregoing pages must convince us that all systems of mounts for heavy guns must come under one of the two heads, of disappearing or open barbette. In order to apply the carriage to the site best adapted to it—that is, to place the carriage best adapted to any site—an analytical discussion of the various forms of gun carriages used in these systems is necessary.

What requirements should carriages for heavy guns fulfill?

First. A firm and reliable platform from which to fire the gun.

Second. Arrangements by which the gun can be easily loaded, traversed, elevated or depressed, and fired.

Third. Cover or protection to gun, carriage, and detachment in proper amounts compatible with efficient service of the gun.

Fourth. Carriages must be simple in construction, easy to manipulate, and strong to sustain the heavy shock of firing, and weather of all sorts; of as light weight as is consistent with strength and movability.

Fifth. They must be economical in first cost and in maintenance.

Sixth. They must be arranged so that the same parts of carriages of the same caliber can be interchangeable and be adjusted to all positions and sites.

Obviously, the first condition is the most essential, and without its fulfillment the entire gun and mount is rendered useless, since in firing guns if the projectile can not be started on its path accurately we simply wantonly waste powder and metal. Carriages mounted in barbette are made sometimes to revolve about a point, called a pintle, at the front and under the chassis. They are then called front-pintle carriages, and necessarily their area of fire is limited. Again, the pintle is under the center of the chassis, and they are then called center-pintle carriages and may then have an all-around fire.

When the pintle is front, errors in the level of the traversing circle may be more easily corrected than when the pintle is in the center. Errors in laying guns may be often counteracted by errors in carriage. But inasmuch as it is presumed that carriages are accurately made and mounted, errors in laying should not occur. Since it is the play at different points between the rails and guides pintle and carriage—that is, those points around which rotation, and flexure of supports between points widely separated—takes place, it can be understood that in barbette carriages, which are either of the front or center pintle pattern, there is more chance of error in the foregoing respects than in the case of the Buffington-Crozier, which revolves on its 24 live rollers, and which can be accurately laid and absolutely level.

Lieut. C. G. Gallup, in a masterly article on artillery carriages, says on this point: "We have our guns, carriages, projectiles, and powders, and our limit in accuracy is their limit. As soon as any new thing is suggested in connection with powder, projectiles, or guns some one or some nation experiments with it to determine its value, and if it will increase the accuracy or power of the gun it is adopted. But it looks as if all our attention was being concentrated on these, to the neglect of the mounts; yet to-day accuracy of fire depends more on the mount than on the guns—i. e., the error of the gun is less than the error of the carriage due to faulty design or workmanship. Why when mounts are made for heavy guns do they always throw them together haphazard, loose in every joint, and uncertain in their action? The breechblock of a gun is made a perfect fit, and what part of the gun carriage has a greater strain? Can we not have a carriage with points and connections so made that they would not look as if made either with insufficient tools or skill, or both?"

When we have such a carriage our accuracy of fire will depend principally on guns, powder, and projectiles, and not, as at present, on the carriage. All carriages for heavy guns consist of a top carriage and a bottom one, or chassis. The former is movable, the latter is fixed—so far as recoil is concerned. Many of our mounts have a high top carriage running on a high chassis. This gives occasion to a couple, about which gun and carriage tend to revolve, and adds to the jump. The navy top carriage has very little height above the gun slide, and the latter being close to its platform the tendency to jump is greatly decreased. The jump of a gun being an uncertain element, every effort should be made to get rid of it, and any mount which causes a gun to recoil in a direction parallel to its own axis reduces to the minimum the overturning couple.

In these days of rapid-fire guns, rapidity of fire, even with heavy guns, is a desideratum. A gun in barbette can be loaded quicker than a disappearing one, but it can not be elevated or depressed, traversed or fired in any less time. As compared with a casemate gun, it may be loaded as quick, but the latter requires a longer time to train. There is a happy medium which must be aimed at between rapidity and deliberation of fire; for if too rapid, then accuracy suffers; but in case of emergency it is necessary to load quickly and have the gun trained and ready to fire at just the instant we wish. Any carriage by which sliding friction is the method used, in part or whole, to check recoil, must be abandoned. The ideal carriage in this respect is the one with few joints, and in which the loading and firing and laying can be done in any position.

On account of great weight, modern gun carriages must be supplied with proper machinery for working carriage and gun with celerity. Of necessity this power should be some other than hand power. It may be steam or electricity or other suitable agent. The same power can be utilized in hoisting ammunition, loading gun, traversing and elevating it, and even running it to a firing position. To reduce recoil to the narrowest limit, without exercising strain on parts of the carriage, there must be a constant pressure maintained in the cylinders, and where friction is depended on as an assistant this can not be the case. The most difficult problem connected with modern ordnance is in the recoil. With barbette guns of an open mount we consider generally only the dissipation of the tremendous energy generated by recoil. But in the Buffington-Crozier gun we go further by utilizing and storing up a part of this energy to raise the gun to the firing position.

The necessity of cover to gun and gunners is greater to-day than ever before. It is claimed that cover makes cowards of men when they are obliged to fight in the open. It is passing strange that human nature, being the same the world over—this applies only to soldiers and not to sailors—it has never been claimed that heavy armor made a sailor less brave than wooden walls. But it is sure that the results of modern wars prove that to work guns effectively gunners must remain with their guns, and where batteries are exposed to the tremendous smothering fire of modern warships at short range they must be protected to a great extent to be of any use at all. Protection is needed in proportion to the extent of danger, and it is of but little use quoting experiences of war in this regard, since a little study of every harbor will easily determine to what extent the danger may exist as against the sites of various batteries.

Since the manipulation of heavy weights, made necessary to sustain the tremendous shock of recoil, requires us to use to a greater or less degree machinery and power other than that of hand, it is extremely necessary that we should seek for simplicity of construction. The material of which carriages are made must be steel in some form in order to reduce weight to a minimum. So, also, since the number, estimated by our ordnance and engineer experts, of guns required to arm all the fortification planned, runs into the thousands, economy in both first cost and maintenance is an important desideratum. The class of men enlisted as soldiers do not possess that degree of mechanical intelligence and knowledge, as to insure the best working of the machinery of gun mounts, which, in their simple form, taxes the greatest minds to thoroughly comprehend. For the same reason the same parts of gun carriages of the same size should be interchangeable, and carriages generally should be adapted to all or any site.

Let us apply the foregoing requirements to the various systems of mounts, and by a comparison of the considerations connected therewith deduce conclusions that will enable us to decide as to the absolutely necessary essentials the proper carriage must possess.

Guns mounted in open barbette have many types of carriages, but all have a top carriage and a chassis. Owing to the fact that the chassis is always fixed, except in traverse, the top carriage being movable, the chassis can be constructed of long, unbraced pieces, which will carry the strain of recoil in the direction of their length. The carriage is, therefore, simpler and more compact. It can be loaded from the breech, and the stored-up energy of recoil can be used to send it—"in battery"—into the firing position.

But it can not be loaded more quickly than either the casemate, turret, or disappearing form of carriage, for the time necessary in the latter to throw the gun into the firing position is offset by the time necessary in the former to run the gun and top carriage "in battery." The volume of fire from this mount is therefore no greater than from others. Is its fire more accurate? Surely not, since owing to the couple engendered by either front or center pintle and the moving of the top carriage on rails is more likely to injure the perfect leveling and accurate laying than is the case of the disappearing gun, mounted on its 24 roller points of support. It is argued, however, that there is a loss of rapidity of fire and of accuracy with the latter carriage, owing to the play at points which can not be eliminated entirely and to the springing of long, unsupported pieces; that the slightest difference of level of base ring, and consequently of the roller path, or even the slightest ellipticity of the base ring, causes the rollers to jam or move hard and unevenly, etc.

When Stephenson built the first locomotive the rails were of wood and it was predicted that the uneven motion would destroy the steam carriages and culminate in accidents, but as time went on rails were changed from wood to iron and these in turn gave way to steel, and to-day railroads have beds so even and smooth, rails jointed together so closely, and withal so strongly made that loads over 100 times as heavy run at tremendous speed without accidents, with no jar or unevenness, and with scarcely a tremor. If the engineer makes his platform properly and the base ring is properly made at the foundry it can be accurately laid and leveled.

Two years ago the majority of our heavy guns were constantly giving trouble in their traversing and laying. To-day such guns are the exceptions and the majority of them, even the 12-inch gun with its great load of carriage and counterweight, amounting to over 250 tons, can be easily started and traversed with one hand. Two hundred years ago watches were larger than many clocks of to-day, yet so great has the advance been in mechanical construction that to-day an accurate timepiece can be made that is no larger than a silver dime. So, also, is the machinery of a disappearing gun made better, tighter fitting, more accurately with every carriage that is turned out. Every ordnance and artillery officer is acquainted with the fact that the present Chief of Ordnance has spent his time for years past perfecting the gun mounts which bear his name.

When the proprietor of a factory having a valuable engine or motor in it starts it up, he does not go out and pick up the first man on the street to run it, but he pays a good salary and hires a competent engineer. In the Army Uncle Sam can not expect that men enlisted everywhere will understand all the complicated mechanism of his various guns and carriages at once, but there is no reason for not believing that where intelligence and care are exercised not only are guns properly mounted, but they are properly kept and properly used, and therefore, due to their tremendous power and accuracy, they are most economical at the critical moments.

The barbette mount does not require the care that the disappearing mount does. The latter requires the care and skill in maintenance and handling. So does the monster 120-ton locomotive that hauls the train from New York to Buffalo and Philadelphia at 70 miles per hour. Given such care, the disappearing carriage will not get out of order, and the longer they are cared for the easier does their manipulation become and the better acquainted with them become their care takers. And when required to respond, how magnificently do they do it. Laid and trained and loaded beneath cover, at will they silently rise in the air, accurately point their huge mouths in the proper direction for an instant, and then vomiting forth their deadly contents at the enemy, at distances that appal naval men, they sink back quietly beneath their cover, leaving no trace whatever of their whereabouts.

Turrets and casemates are fully as costly as the disappearing mounts; in fact, the first is more so. They are capable of being fired with as great rapidity as either the open barbette or disappearing mount. But casemates limit the field of fire to a dangerous extent, while the disappearing gun has an all-around fire. The former offers an ideal target to the enemy, and by repeated blows becomes vulnerable. The latter is inconspicuous and presents nothing to fire at. Turrets, while not so conspicuous, are far more complicated in their machinery, and a single shot, while not injuring the gun, may jam it if it be a front pintle gun. The open barbette mount has an advantage of costing less than the disappearing, but this difference in both parapet and carriage does not amount to 6 per cent less in favor of the barbette.

As against its greater cost the disappearing gun has 20 per cent greater accuracy. Its platform is more stable, and while its parts are more numerous, they are like the parts of a steam engine, capable of greater power. The usual form of barbette mounts dissipates the energy of recoil, but the disappearing mount takes it up, stores it, and uses it to throw the gun up to the firing position. The barbette gun mount is lighter, but as all mounts of large guns are heavy and require machinery to manipulate, this consideration bears no weight, except in the one matter of cost. The barbette mounts can not be used on certain sites, as, for instance, those on low levels, while, as pointed out in Major Knight's article, the disappearing gun can. The disappearing-gun mount can be used on all sites, although it has its maximum advantages at certain elevations of about 100 feet.

But it is the one requirement of cover or protection that the adherents of the disappearing gun must place their greatest reliance on, and insist that in that particular alone its advantages are so superlative that without others it will outweigh the other systems. It is said that Napoleon scorned fortifications and relied on the courage of his soldiers as being the best protection. That was all right a century ago, but had the great general lived in these modern times of accurate firing of shrapnel, of steel shells filled with high explosives, he would have changed his mind. Because there has never been a really first-class combat between forts and ships in modern times, and because in the halfway combats that have been held the forts have more than held their own is no argument for doing away with protection to gun and detachment.

We hope that there never will be such a combat, and we believe there never will be, but it will be because the forts and guns are properly constructed with cover for men and weapons. To make the gun efficient men must be protected, and the importance of proper cover can not be overestimated. The protection should only be compatible with the efficient handling of the gun. The barbette mount does not afford this; the disappearing mount does. A modern battle ship possesses an average of 8 rapid-fire guns to 1 heavy one. Land fortifications with us so far do not possess 1¼ rapid-fire to 1 heavy gun.

To place six rapid-fire guns ashore to every heavy gun would give an immense superiority to the land over naval guns, since in considering the relative accuracy of the two, the former distances the latter by two and three to one. As a matter of fact, it is contrary to every principle of reasoning to presume that any naval attack can silence coast defenses if proper care has been displayed in their location, design, construction, and armament. It is computed that the land gun overmatches the naval gun by two and three to one. The results of the few actual combats between naval and land guns—at Alexandria, at Rio de Janeiro, at Wei-Hai-Wei, at San Juan, at Santiago—all prove the immense superiority of land fire to naval fire.

Major Clarke in his Fortifications says: "The vessels of a fleet greatly outmatched the coast defenses in number of guns, in many cases, 100 to 1, and consequently to the same extent in the number of projectiles, weight of metal per gun being practically equal. The ranges were absurdly short, compared with those at which fighting must be done in the future, varying from 50 to seldom over 600 or 700 yards." This was a century ago or more he had reference to, and while ranges were increased to the average of about 2,000 yards at Alexandria, the power and accuracy and volume of fire poured from the naval guns had increased in a much greater proportion. To-day a naval vessel coming to within 2,000 yards of a fort seeks to overwhelm the latter with its volume of fire from rapid-fire guns.

To pour out such a volume of fire from 30 to 40 guns for five minutes only, on the front or crest of a single battery, means a complete smothering of any attempt by the latter to show either gun, mount, or detachment. When rapid-fire guns are mounted in the proportion of 4 to 6 to every heavy gun, then the shore batteries can in turn smother and overwhelm the fire of the ships. To prevent ships from passing up channels submarine mines are placed where they can be advantageously used; but, even so, they must be defended by rapid-fire guns. Since, therefore, ships will come within close fighting ranges of 2,000 to 3,000 yards and attempt to overwhelm by their fire that of the defenses, it is here that the heavy guns can be most advantageously used.

Without cover they are helpless, but with cover to load and train, they rise at the touch of the lever, are fired at a practically point-blank range, their projectiles going straight through the armor of the ship, and then sink back again invisible to all, but the detachment completely protected. On level sites like the southern entrance to New York Harbor, and in fact the majority of harbors of the Atlantic coast, the gun mounted on the disappearing carriage is essential to efficient protection. If an ordinary barbette mounted gun ashore is worth two guns afloat, then a disappearing gun is worth four, since its protection practically increases its efficiency 100 per cent. Referring to the disappearing gun, Colonel Clarke, the noted British engineer, says: "Of all methods of mounting yet proposed, the disappearing principle offers the greatest advantages. * * * The gun, laid under cover by a position-finder, will be vulnerable only for a few seconds before each round. Its exact position can only be identified during the brief period of visibility. There appears to be no satisfactory mode of attacking it."

To sum up, then, we find the main objections to the disappearing gun to be, viz:

First. Its cost. But, as stated, this is only 6 per cent more than the barbette mount, and less than the turret, and about the same as the casemate.

Second. Trouble in mounting and unreliability when wanted. As for this, if our artillery officers will take the same trouble, from colonels down to second lieutenants, to study and know their weapons as battery mechanics, they will find that the guns can be properly mounted, and wherever this is done, it can be properly cared for, and when the same degree of care and intelligence is bestowed on it as on their pocket watches it will respond the same and never be found wanting. Officers must be ready to put on canvas overalls and go down in the gun-pits and climb around the machinery and personally know the reason and use of every bit of mechanism. When this is the case there will no longer be complaints about its getting out of order, its unreliability, etc.

Third. By reason of the detachment being always under cover it is feared by many that a sense of dependence on cover will be engendered, which at certain times might make cowards of the artillery soldier.

Calm reflection on this argument will show what utter nonsense it is. Americans are naturally brave to temerity, and to remain under cover when all the excitement of action is passing outside requires a degree of personal restriction that is far braver than the physical rush and action of yelling and cheering in a mêlée. It is not necessary to linger on this point. We have good guns and good mounts and the best cover. Let us work and train our men to handle them to the best of our ability, and trust to the truth and patriotism, honesty and bravery of American manhood, and the nation may rest assured that the attack of the combined navies of the world will not break through the cordon of our coast fortifications armed with our disappearing guns.

For our uses the disappearing guns are essential even on the high bluffs of the Pacific. But on the low sandy wastes of the Gulf and South Atlantic States they are absolutely indispensable for efficient protection, while in the wide-mouthed channels of Long Island Sound, Chesapeake Bay, and Puget Sound, where the waters are too deep and wide to place any dependence on submarine mines and navies may congregate in force against any battery, it is only the Buffington-Crozier system that will give us victory. In conclusion, we may remark that though little use of disappearing systems has been made in Europe in the past to-day Great Britain, Sweden, Norway, Spain, Italy, Russia, and Holland are making use of them and arming their coast defenses with guns on disappearing carriages.

A gun behind a parapet that can not be penetrated, mounted on a reliable and firm platform, with mechanism that will insure its perfect running in and out of battery, when fired with heavy charges and when used for drill and practice—that is at all times invisible, except for the brief time that it vomits its deadly, blinding, crashing load directly at the enemy—that is the best kind of a defense possible to have. In our system of disappearing carriages, properly handled, we have all the essentials called for. That the gun carriage can be made to respond at any time or all times to what may be demanded of it, in peace and the rough action of target practice, with heavy charges, has been proved by more than one artillery officer. Like a steam engine, constant and daily use makes the machinery more efficient until its usefulness is impaired by time alone.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask if the article which the Senator from Vermont has had printed in the RECORD was not written by an engineer officer, Mr. Ruckman, who was the most violently opposed to the disappearing carriage of any one of the ninety-one upon whom calls were made for answers?

Mr. PERKINS. Without answering that I am willing to have the two essays speak for themselves against the one which has been presented by the Senator from Vermont.

I wish to say parenthetically that the Senator from Vermont and all of us have the same common object in view. We want to do that which is for the best interest of the Government. He wants a fort and guns on it, so that a ship of war can not storm it and take it. We both have the same object in view. The only difference is how we may arrive at it. Therefore this discussion has a good effect. It brings out the defects on both sides. No one is perfect. When the Senator from Vermont was Secretary of War he was always striving to improve our fortifications. Our submarine fortifications to-day are better than any other in the world. I agree with the Senator that in a high elevation, perhaps, the barbette gun is the best, but on a low level, in the line of a marsh, a breech-loading gun that disappears, that the men can lower, has great advantages over any other implement of war.

Mr. PROCTOR. You have some of them in California mounted over 300 feet.

Mr. PERKINS. That is on a barbette, my dear friend. It is on a barbette at Lime Point.

Mr. PROCTOR. I beg the Senator's pardon. He will see from the reports that they are not.

Mr. PERKINS. I have been to one of them, and it is on a barbette. There may be some disappearing carriages there, but that which I have seen with my own eyes I know to be there. I know we have guns mounted upon barbette carriages at the entrance to the Golden Gate in San Francisco Harbor.

Mr. President, if we can have a vote at this time upon this question——

Mr. TELLER. We can not.

Mr. PERKINS. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from North Dakota, who wishes to have a new depot built for the capital city of the nation. I want to fortify the Potomac and Newport News and the other parts of the country, so that the Capitol can not be destroyed, as it was once destroyed by the British.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it can not be that the Senator from California wished to be understood that all expenditures for these disappearing carriages were approved by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. He will see on the fifth page of Document 336, sent us by the Secretary of War, that the majority of that board disapproved of it and recommended that no more be made than those now under construction for high and medium sites, not on low sites, until the proportion of those to be placed in such fortifications would have been limited to one-third of the total number. The Board of Ordnance and Fortification has been opposed to these disappearing carriages, but its recommendations have no weight and force. All the appropriations are put under the control of the Ordnance Corps. The board has been recently reconstructed by removing Colonel Story and Colonel Rodgers, two officers who were strongly opposed to these carriages, and putting on officers who favored them. That has very recently been done. It has been done within a few days or a few weeks at most, and Major Pratt has been put on the board.

Now, Mr. President, one word more. My point about this is that we are staking everything, so far as our coast defense is concerned, five-sixths of our armament being mounted on these carriages which, it is plain to see from the reports, are an experiment. If they fail, as some officers express here their views that they will within half an hour after serious firing—and they never have been tested under conditions that would exist in battle—our coast defense, on which we have spent, I believe, some $60,000,000 already, is practically lost.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to state to my friend from Vermont that General Crozier said that the present board consists of Lieutenant-General Miles, Commanding General of the Army; General Gillespie, Chief of Engineers, United States Army; Colonel Rodgers, of the artillery; General Randolph, Chief of Artillery; Major Shaler, of the Ordnance Department, and Major Pratt, of the artillery, and General Henderson, civilian member. That was stated to us last week by General Crozier.

Mr. PROCTOR. It may be that I was wrong in stating that Colonel Rodgers had been removed. I think the board has been reconstituted so that it will favor the continuance of the exploiting of this invention made by the present Chief of Ordnance. Colonel Story has been removed and Major Pratt has been put in his place.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask a question before the Senator sits down. He says the board has been reconstructed in favor of the Buffington-Crozier carriage. I understand the change recently made was to take General Crozier off the board.

Mr. PROCTOR. General Crozier was taken off the board. The attention of the Secretary of War had been called long ago to the statute forbidding an officer who was interested in an invention to be on that board, and after General Crozier's nomination came in here and it was known that was a point being considered he was relieved from the board and Major Shaler, of the Ordnance Corps, was put in his place. That is independent of the removal of Colonel Story and the placing of Major Pratt on the board. That makes a change in favor of the disappearing carriage.

Mr. WARREN. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that change could hardly be attributed to those who favored the present carriage, because the men taken off were men not opposed to it, and the men put on certainly were not those more favorable to it than those taken off.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, Colonel Story was very strongly opposed to it, and was well known so to be. He was a member of the board at that time, but he has no letter in this list, because those letters were answers to requests sent to officers then in command of posts where these carriages had been placed. He was taken off in a very short time, within a few weeks at the outside, and Captain Pratt, who wrote perhaps the strongest letter in favor of the disappearing carriages, was put on the board in place of Colonel Story.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. With the permission of the Senator in charge of that bill, I will ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, and that the union-station bill may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be again informally laid aside, and that what is known as the union-station bill be now considered by the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

UNION RAILROAD STATION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4825) to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Mr. President, the question now pending before the Senate in regard to the union depot and terminal facilities for the Baltimore and Ohio and Pennsylvania and other railroads is one of such importance, involving the expenditure of a large amount of money, that it should be, in my opinion, considered from the standpoint of the utmost fairness to the railroad companies, to the District of Columbia, and to the Government, and as well should the rights of individual citizens be properly considered.

This bill was introduced some weeks ago and referred to the committee of which I have the honor to be a member. It was, at a meeting of that committee at which I was not present and of which I had no knowledge, referred to a subcommittee.

When reported back to the committee there were some questions relating to the building of a tunnel through the Capitol grounds which first attracted my attention, and to which I raised objection. There were some engineers of the railroad company and of the District of Columbia who appeared before the committee and were interrogated as to the character of the ground through which this tunnel was to be built. It was developed that not a single boring had ever been made in the hill to determine the nature of the ground underlying the Library building; none of the engineers knew anything about its formation. But in view of the fact that there have been a number of disasters in the subways which are now being built in New York City, and have occurred in the building of a railway through Baltimore, at Philadelphia, and at Toledo, Ohio, and in view of the fact that there might be a possibility that this proposed tunnel might seriously damage this great structure, the Library building, which is the pride of this nation, and which has not, except perhaps when we consider the great cathedrals and buildings of that character, a parallel or an equal on the face of this globe, the matter was discussed; these engineers were examined, and it was determined that the tunnel should be removed a farther distance away from the Library building, which, upon examination, I believe will obviate the questions so far as the building proper is concerned; but whether or not it will, so far as the so-called approaches are concerned, which consist of heavy masonry, I am not able to determine.

There was another objection raised in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] with regard to an alleged and probable monopoly that might be maintained by these roads which are concerned with their terminals in this city; but, as I understand, the people connected with these railroad corporations have agreed to an amendment of a similar character, which is satisfactory to the Senator from Colorado.

The matter then stands before us comprehending a series of improvements involving a large amount of money. It is proposed to pay to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in order to have them move their terminals from the Mall, the sum of $1,500,000. That is to be paid by the Government. For my part, I should be glad to see the terminals removed from that ground, in order that the proposed beautification of the city of Washington, which I believe will eventually be adopted, may be properly carried out. The remainder of the expenditures are to be divided between the Government and the District of Columbia.

Now let us see what this comprehends. A report has been submitted here, which is, I believe, by the Commissioners of the District, in which it is stated that $1,500,000 is to be paid to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in consideration of improvements and changes that are to be made. I believe that this amount, as well as the $1,500,000 to be paid to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, are comprised in existing legislation before these two railroads became united in their interests.

The next item is $500,000 for grading and paving. The next is $500,000 to purchase the land. The next is $600,000 to pay any damages that may accrue to any parties interested in that locality. Then there is another item of $170,000 for something connected with South Washington, which I do not clearly understand. The amount of money that is mentioned here—$500,000—for the purchase of land comprises some territory which belongs to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, which the Government and the District of Columbia are to purchase and pay for.

There is no information presented, so far as I know, which explains what amount of land is to be purchased or what price shall be paid therefor. A portion of this land is to be appropriated for the use of a plaza to be made in front of the great building that is to be erected. The depot building is to stand north of the Capitol, some distance from the present terminus of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and facing directly in a southerly direction upon Massachusetts avenue, and east of New Jersey avenue. The façade of this building is, I believe, to be something over 700 feet in length. The proposed plaza will have a length of about 1,000 feet and a width of about 500 feet.

In connection with the purchase of such land from the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad as may be needed for the purposes of this plaza, there are some streets and alleys to be opened on the existing possessions of the railroad company, which are likewise to be paid for.

As I stated, this proposed depot is to be located in a great depression north of the Capitol. Why it becomes necessary to adopt this ground, which seems to me to be unfavorable in its location, I do not understand; but I suppose it is in accordance with the views of the civil engineers who have the matter in charge. This fact, however, stares us in the face: It will require a filling of a large area of ground to the depth, in some places, I believe, of 36 feet. This depth, of course, will diminish as we go away from the depot; but it will extend to the circle at the connection of Massachusetts avenue with New Jersey avenue on the west, so that you may get some idea as to the extent of the filling required.

The railroad company does not itself propose to do this. It proposes to haul the earth necessary for the filling from the country and to deliver it on the ground; but it will be distributed at the expense of the Government and the District of Columbia, joining equally, I believe, in the expenditure.

As to the amount of filling that will be required, the number of cubic feet, and the cost of the same, no estimate has been filed or placed before this committee, of which I am aware, and I have inquired for it. There are no estimates showing the amount of ground that we are to purchase or the cost of the same. The plaza and the streets and alleys are all to be filled with earth.

Now comes the question of damages, for which it is proposed to set aside the sum of $600,000. There is no report on the bill, of which I am aware, that sets out clearly the amount of land involved or an estimate of the value of the property, or a description of the same by maps, or any estimate whatever as to the probable cost that these damages may involve before we get through with them.

Mr. President, I doubt very much if a half dozen members of this committee have ever seen this ground. I have looked over it, and I find that it embraces a considerable area of ground affecting a number of blocks, upon which are built structures which are now inhabited. There is one building, to which my attention has been called, for which the owner gets a rental of about $10,000 per annum. If you will contemplate the proposition carefully in your minds, you will readily see that when these streets and alleys are filled up to a depth of from 10 to 36 feet all the property surrounded by these fills will be a long way below the surface of the streets. Indeed, I can not understand how this filling is to be properly, carefully, and effectually done without damage and without covering these submerged lots, as I may call them, unless retaining walls are put in, particularly where the filling is from 30 to 36 feet.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that the Engineer Commissioner of the District, Colonel Biddle, who is a man of great skill in his profession, differs from the opinions held by the engineers of the railroad companies; and the suggestion that was made that this very deep filling was a necessity was in deference to the views of the Engineer Commissioner of the District. I have been informed by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia that since that time Colonel Biddle has admitted that the proposed fill was altogether greater than was necessary, and that it will be reduced at least one-half. I have that information from the chairman of the committee, and that is the only authority I can give.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Even then, Mr. President, it would be simply a diminution of the cost of filling; but so far as the property owners are concerned it seems to me it would be just as serious for them.

It is proposed that in the estimate of the damages to the property owners of that locality the question of the appreciation of values when the improvements are made shall be considered. I do not think it is conceded by any one understanding the proposition that this work can be finished under four or five years. Shall the property owner be required to wait until the alleged appreciation of values shall be determined before he is entitled to redress? In the meantime what is he to do? How will he get access to his property? If he has tenants, they will leave him. There is no way, in my opinion, that you can get at this matter fairly and honorably to those property holders in that locality except by a condemnation of their property and the purchase of it by the Government and the District of Columbia, if they are to assume these burdens.

Many of these people are poor. They are not themselves able to fill up the grounds, and we do not propose to do it for them. If they were able to have earth brought in there and have the ground graded up to the level of the street, it would be necessary to pull down their structures, because it would be necessary to have new foundations on which to build new structures, thus practically destroying their property. I believe, Mr. President, that this would be a practical confiscation of the rights of the property holders in that locality unless the theory which I have suggested should be carried out in our treatment of them.

Nothing has been submitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia to give them any definite information as to the amount of damages that might be claimed in order to settle these difficulties. The committee put the amount at $600,000, but they admit in their report that it is almost impossible to arrive at a conclusion, and that is correct.

This is not a business-like proposition. I do not wish to stand in the way of improvement; but no business man with any sagacity or training, unless he cared to run the risk of bankruptcy proceedings, would undertake to go into an enterprise of this kind unless he had all the data to enable him to count the cost thereof.

Mr. President, in the discussion of this matter in the committee the question of revenue was suggested, and it was stated that the amount of revenue to be derived under the proposed personal-tax law would be about $1,500,000 per annum; that this expense might be spread over a term of years, and that the District, so far as its part is concerned, would be able to take care of it. But is this true?

The question of damages, the question of filling, the question of purchasing this land, will render it necessary that all the expenses to which the District of Columbia may be subjected will probably have to be incurred in the first twelve or eighteen months, but the personal-tax bill has not yet passed the United States Senate and the House of Representatives, and we do not know when it will, if at all. It may turn out, as I believe will be found to be true, that the costs for damages that will accrue from the injury to the property holders of that locality may amount to twice as much as has been contemplated. It is all guesswork. There has been no studied effort to arrive at just and accurate conclusions. I do not believe in rushing into a proposition of this kind until we not only count the cost but until we ascertain our ability to meet the cost.

Mr. President, it has been contended that this is the inauguration of a great system of beautification of the capital of the nation. I would not for one hour stand in the way of that contemplated improvement. The question as to who shall pay the expense thereof will be determined, and I believe justly it should fall on the Government of the United States, and not on the District of Columbia. I believe the time will come, and that it is not far distant, when the plans that have been laid before you for improving the Mall and erecting the Government buildings that will be constructed on both sides of the great avenue, to extend past the Washington Monument, to the proposed Lincoln Memorial, and to the proposed Memorial Bridge, will be put into execution. Mr. President, when that day does come, and when we find the great thoroughfare open in the region described, one may behold a scene of beauty and grandeur in the way of architectural effects that can not be surpassed anywhere in the world; and I trust when that is accomplished that some spot may be set apart and devoted to a memorial to that great architect, L'Enfant, who conceived and designed the magnificent plan upon which this city is being constructed.

Mr. President, I am not an obstructionist. I do not wish to delay anything in the way of improvement. I am willing that the railways shall have fair consideration, and I desire, if it can be accomplished in a reasonable way and the railways are made to sustain the proper portion of the burden, that these improvements may be carried out; but with the lack of data, with the vague understanding we have of this proposition, I am in favor of recommitting the bill in order that we may have accurate data and correct estimates.

I therefore move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, in order that proper data and information may be laid before us, so that we may all vote intelligently upon the question.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I shall occupy but ten or fifteen minutes of the time of the Senate. I had hoped that an investigation would lead me to cast my vote in favor of the passage of this bill. I have implicit faith in the integrity and the business ability of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. MCMILLAN]. I have the honor of serving with him on the Committee on Commerce, and I know that he is a careful, painstaking Senator. I have implicit faith in the business ability and integrity of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who champions this bill. But, Mr. President, investigation has led me to say that I ought not and can not conscientiously support this measure.

I believe that every Senator, before this bill is voted on, ought to examine with care the streets that these roads expect to occupy when the change is made. I took the liberty yesterday evening of going over these grounds. I am unwilling, Mr. President, to cast my vote in favor of a bill that provides that a tunnel 4,000 feet in length, 28 feet in width, and 50 feet below the surface of the ground shall be cut or dug in front of the Library.

I believe, Mr. President, that a careful investigation will show that when these railroads shall change their present sites and occupy principally First street, to which I now refer, you will find upon investigation that at least 75 dwellings will be absolutely destroyed at the lower end of this tunnel near where this union depot is to be located; and I do not question that these dwellings will cost the Government and the District of Columbia two or three millions of dollars. Mr. President, I took the liberty of counting these dwellings where this 30-foot fill is to be located, and I find there are either 74 or 75 that will be absolutely destroyed, and by reason of these cuts and fills more than 60 other dwellings will be injured from 50 to 60 per cent.

Mr. President, I believe that the damages that will accrue to property owners by reason of this change will be equal to three or four millions of dollars. I believe before we make a change of this kind data and information should be furnished to the Senate showing the number of buildings that will be injured, the number that will be destroyed, and the possible cost to the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia.

Another thing, Mr. President. There has been no attempt to bore and ascertain what kind of ground and soil is to be found where the Library is located. Before an attempt is made to put a tunnel there, by all means we ought to endeavor to show what kind of ground it is and whether any danger will accrue to the Library building, that cost seven or eight millions of dollars.

Again, an examination of this bill will show another fact. Congress grants to these railroads—and I have nothing to say against the railroads; I have nothing but the kindest feelings toward them, but I am speaking from a business standpoint and in regard to what we ought to do to protect the Government and the District of Columbia. When this bill passes it will give to these two railroads the right to occupy these streets for all time to come; and in the event they cease to occupy them, in my opinion, under the provisions of this bill, these roads could sell these streets to any other purchaser.

My idea of a city granting franchises to a railroad is simply this: They should not be granted for any other purposes except railroad and depot purposes; and when a corporation ceases to exercise these rights and privileges they should always come back to the grantor. Mr. President, again—I want to be extremely brief—I have been told that this bill was not considered more than thirty minutes in the District Committee. Here is a bill involving seven or eight millions of dollars. This bill ought to have been maturely considered; and not only that, but we ought to have been furnished with a map pointing out the streets that these roads are to occupy, giving to Senators all of the information necessary to guide them in this important legislation.

Just another word. Something has been said, and very well said, in regard to an act that we passed in 1901. I understand that Congress passed an act in 1901 giving a million and a half dollars to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to assist in changing its present depot location and in building another depot. My friend the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] says we have already given $1,500,000 to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and he says that this simply continues that appropriation, consequently that by reason of the passage of this act we do nothing more than to continue the present legislation.

I said to the Senator the other day that my recollection was that the act of 1901, which gave $1,500,000 to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, specially provided that that road, when it vacated its present tracks and vacated certain streets and property that it owned at present, should convey by deed to the District of Columbia and the Government of the United States this property, in order to in part pay for the $1,500,000 we gave them. My friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, said he thought I was mistaken. I thought I was correct and I took the liberty of hunting up the act. I find, Mr. President, on page 5 of this act, the following:

> From and after the expiration of five years from the date of the passage of this act all rights of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to maintain and operate the present tracks of its Washington Branch Railroad within the limits of the city of Washington, and the present tracks of its Metropolitan Branch Railroad south of the northern line of New York avenue, also extending from the north line of New York avenue to the north line of Q street, and west of the east line of Third street to said north line of New York avenue, shall cease and determine; and the said railroad company shall thereupon, within such reasonable time as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall prescribe, remove all such tracks and structures connected therewith from the streets, avenues, public reservations, or other property of the United States on all the lines to be abandoned as aforesaid.
> Said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company shall also immediately execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a deed, in due form of law, granting, conveying, assigning, and transferring to the United States of America all the estates, right, title, and interest that it, the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, has in, to, or out of the lands included within the limits of the roadway or right of way of the Washington Branch Railroad of said company from the west line of Second street to Winthrop Heights Station and of the Metropolitan Branch for the continuation of Third street from Q street south to New York avenue, of an even width as north of Q street, subject, however, as to so much of said lands as lie north of Florida avenue and outside of the limits of the city of Washington, to the continued maintenance and use of the present tracks of said railroad company thereon, for the purpose of reaching its yard and roundhouse at Trinidad, until its new yard in or near Eckington and its roundhouse, authorized by this act, shall be ready for use, but not exceeding six years from the date of the passage of this act; said company, however, to have the right to remove its tracks and structures from the lands so granted within sixty days after the expiration of its right to maintain and use its tracks thereon.
> In consideration of the surrender by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, under the requirements of this act, of its rights under the several acts of Congress heretofore passed, and under its several contracts with the municipal authorities of the city of Washington authorized by said acts of Congress, and in consideration of the large expenditures required for the construction of the new terminals, viaduct, and connecting railroads, as required by this act, to avoid all grade crossings of streets and avenues within the city of Washington, and, further, in consideration of the grant and conveyance to the United States of the lands included within the limits of the roadway and right of way of the Washington Branch Railroad, which can be used for a street or avenue for the public benefit, the sum of $1,500,000, to be paid to said railroad company toward the cost of the construction of said elevated terminals, viaduct, and structures within the city of Washington, shall be, and is hereby, appropriated, one-half to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the other half to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. The sum so appropriated shall be paid upon presentation of a certificate by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that the said viaduct has been completed as required by this act.

The act provides that they shall deed this property back to the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia to in part compensate us for the $1,500,000 we give them. It is estimated, in the report made on that bill, that that property is worth $1,300,000. Consequently, if that be true, we only lost, by the act of 1901, $200,000; but this bill that continues to give them $1,500,000 does not require the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to give to the Government of the United States or the District any property whatever.

Now, Mr. President, we would be in much better condition to stand by the act of 1901, for we would get back to some extent the property to compensate us for the $1,500,000 which we give the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. This bill requires nothing of this kind from the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Again, I was talking to a citizen of the District of Columbia, of splendid business qualities, a man who has succeeded in managing his own finances, a man who is thoroughly acquainted with the streets where this new line is to be located, and he says that in his opinion if these streets belonged to private citizens and these roads had to buy the franchises they would cost eight or ten million dollars.

Mr. President, I am willing, if it becomes necessary, to allow them to go through the streets, provided they do not injure the streets. But what do we do by this legislation? As business Senators let us look at it and see what we do. We give to them in perpetuity the streets on which they are to locate their lines, without a dollar's expense to them. We give to one corporation $1,500,000 to help it build this depot. We give to another corporation $1,500,000, an absolute gratuity, and then we give $1,670,000 additional to help them do this work.

When this bill is thoroughly analyzed it can not stand the test of analysis, and I tell you, Mr. President, when we say that we will give these railroads the right of way, when we give them the streets which a business man in this city says are worth $10,000,000, when we give them $3,000,000 in cash, when we give them $1,670,000 more to help them do this work, it can not, in my opinion, be justified under any circumstances.

I exceedingly regret that I have felt it to be my duty to oppose the measure. Mr. President, it looks to me as if those Senators who are always so faithful and efficient in the discharge of their duties in all probability have been pressed with other matters, as we frequently are pressed, and have not gone to the bottom of this legislation. It strikes me the best course to pursue is to refer it back to the Committee on the District of Columbia, in order that a more thorough investigation may be had, and let us see, Mr. President, if we can not avoid part of the expenses that are to be incurred and locate this tunnel, if we are going to locate it, somewhere else.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to know why it has been deemed necessary to ask for new legislation on this subject when, it seems to me, the whole matter was gone over and disposed of in the last Congress?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will answer that. The last Congress gave the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad the privilege of building a station at the junction of Delaware avenue and C street, moving their station east two blocks. It gave the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad the privilege of building a new station on the site they now occupy. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia and the gentlemen who have in charge the park system of the District—three of the most distinguished architects in the country—thought it would be a good plan to have a union station in the city of Washington instead of having these two stations separately as they are now. They put their wits to work, and after numerous interviews with the railroad officials they succeeded in reaching an agreement whereby one station should be built instead of two. That, of course, necessitates new legislation.

I trust I have answered the Senator's question.

Now, Mr. President, it is not very flattering to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which has had this matter in charge for a good many years, to be told by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] that he took a stroll down over the part of Washington known as "Swampoodle," probably last Sunday, and that he knows more about this matter than the Committee on the District of Columbia and the engineers of the District and the Board of Commissioners of the District. It may be he does, but my judgment is that he knows very much less about it. The Senator from Georgia says it will cost $10,000,000, in his judgment, as damages to property.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I did not say any such thing. I do not want to contradict the Senator, but——

Mr. GALLINGER. I should be very glad to have the Senator state what he did say.

Mr. CLAY. I said a prominent business man of the city of Washington, who is thoroughly familiar with the streets, said to me that, in his opinion, if the streets that are to be occupied by the new line belonged to private citizens and the railroads had to buy them, the franchises would cost $10,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the absurdity of that is contained in the statement. That entire section of the District is not worth $10,000,000, and it is idle to say that the streets that are given up to these railroad corporations to put a building on them is a gift of $10,000,000. Every man who has given this matter a moment's thought or investigation knows that that statement is so wide of the mark that there is no reason why it should be discussed for a single moment.

The Senator from Georgia says he understands—I do not know who told him; perhaps this intelligent citizen—that the pending bill was considered only thirty minutes in the Committee on the District of Columbia. Why, Mr. President, this question of the elimination of grade crossings and the construction of terminals in the District of Columbia has been under consideration for ten years, not thirty minutes. This matter has been gone over and over again in that committee, especially by the chairman of the committee, and it has had the most careful and conscientious consideration.

In the Fifty-sixth Congress, when the laws were passed that are now on the statute book giving these railroad companies the right to construct new stations, which they say they prefer to the proposed legislation, it was considered for weeks and, I think, for months in that committee. The bill which is now before the Senate was introduced two months ago or more, and has been advertised to every citizen of the District, to every member of both branches of Congress. It has had the most careful consideration of the subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was presented at several meetings of the full committee, whether Senators were present or not, and was gone over section by section, and line by line, and word by word. If Senators who are on the committee or off the committee do not understand or did not then understand the provisions of the bill, it certainly is not the fault of the chairman of the committee or of the committee itself.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask, in the line of the other question, if it will not interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it not true that since the other law was passed the railroads interested have come into a closer community of interest and that there is no necessity for the same railroad having two depots?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator very promptly and tell him all I know about it. It has been said over and over again that the Pennsylvania Railroad controls the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not go that far; but that it is largely interested in the directory I take it to be a matter of public knowledge.

Mr. GALLINGER. Four out of 12 members of the board are Pennsylvania Railroad men.

Mr. BAILEY. Four out of 12 are Pennsylvania Railroad men, but the ownership of the stock very largely controls the directory, although the directory might have been originally selected in another interest.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I will state what my suggestion is simply intended to cover. We agree to give each road a million and a half to build its own depot. Now, I think the union depot is desirable myself. I hardly believe in bringing it in under the ground. I incline to the light myself, and would prefer to take the less attractive appearance of an elevated road. Leaving that as it may be, it is perfectly plain that these two railroads are now if not identical in interest, yet so largely so that they ought to have only one depot, and I think they might be permitted to take one of the two sites Congress provided for, with the $3,000,000 that were appropriated to both and execute the improvement under the old law with a slight amendment authorizing that, and save us these new and perplexing questions.

Mr. GALLINGER. First, as to the community of interest as between these two roads, I will say to the Senator that all I know is what Mr. Green, vice-president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and Mr. Loree, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, stated before the committee. Both those gentlemen stated that the Pennsylvania Railroad, neither in the matter of ownership of stock nor in the matter of directors, controlled the Baltimore and Ohio road. That is all I know about it. That there is a closer interest than existed two years ago I think is beyond question, but how far that goes I am unable to say, and I am bound to believe what these gentlemen stated to the committee.

Mr. WELLINGTON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I think one thing is evident, however, that they may have forgotten to state. Mr. Loree is one of the vice-presidents of the Pennsylvania Railroad and has been made the president of the Baltimore and Ohio road. Is not that true?

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not know it, but I presume it is. If the Senator states it, it is true.

Mr. WELLINGTON. That is the case.

Mr. GALLINGER. That, of course, simply shows that a gentleman connected with the Pennsylvania road is a director in the Baltimore and Ohio, or vice versa.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, the object being to get rid of the grade crossings, as I understand it, how many street crossings do we get rid of by this proposition?

Mr. GALLINGER. We get rid of every grade crossing there is in the District that these roads traverse. The number I can not state.

Mr. TELLER. How do we get rid of them?

Mr. GALLINGER. By elevating the tracks.

Mr. TELLER. By elevating the railroad tracks?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. Or by elevating the streets?

Mr. GALLINGER. The railroad tracks.

Mr. TELLER. It is a part of the plan certainly to elevate the streets, according to my information.

Mr. GALLINGER. On the Baltimore and Ohio road there are a few instances of that kind, but we get rid of every grade crossing in the District of Columbia under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. TELLER. Under one or the other?

Mr. GALLINGER. Under one plan or the other.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Texas suggests we might have taken one of these sites. We certainly would not take the site on the Mall, because that is one of the chief things we have in view in this legislation—to get rid of a railroad station on the Mall. As I understand the matter, the location at the junction of Delaware avenue and C street was not as desirable a location as the one that has been selected. I will not go into particulars about that, but that was the judgment of the District Commissioners and of the railroad companies themselves.

I am bound to believe after the very careful investigation that has been made of this matter both by the District Commissioners, who are very wise men, by engineers representing the Government, and by engineers representing the railroad corporations, the proposed location is, all things considered, the best location that could have been found in the District.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] has made a very strong appeal—and we all know the kindness of his heart—in behalf of the poor people located in the vicinity of this proposed railroad station. Their interests are going to be wiped out and the property confiscated according to the statement of the Senator from Georgia. A very distinguished gentleman, formerly a member of this body, appeared before our committee, representing those people, and said they were perfectly satisfied with the matter as it was arranged. He was their attorney. I will not mention his name unless I am asked to do so, but he is a very distinguished gentleman who occupied at one time a seat on the other side of this Chamber. As a representative of those people he stated to the committee that the matter was satisfactory so far as they were concerned.

The Northeast Washington Citizens' Association, a business association having interests in that section of the city, only the other evening voted in favor of this bill, as they had done once or twice before.

I can not believe under those circumstances that this outrage, if Senators wish to call it such, is going to be perpetrated upon the people of that section of the city or that any substantial harm is going to come to them. There will be some inconveniences, of course. There never was a grade changed in a city that did not inconvenience somebody. There never was a great structure placed where human habitation is that did not inconvenience somebody and, very likely, damage somebody. I take it there will be some inconvenience and damage connected with this matter; but it is a well-known axiom that the individual interests to some extent must give way when a great public improvement is projected.

The committee certainly have sought to minimize that in every conceivable way and protect those people as far as they can be protected; and I feel sure that the measure is guarded as well as it will be guarded if this bill should be sent back to the committee and the committee is compelled to consider it again and report it, probably in substantially the same form.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Georgetown Citizens' Association met recently and voted almost unanimously, as I understand, against this measure, and that the East Washington Citizens' Association meeting, to which the Senator has referred, was attended by seven members of that association.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I recall another bit of history. A few years ago the Georgetown people wanted a railroad to come into Georgetown and have a station there. I voted for it and the Senator from North Dakota voted against it, for some reason or other; I do not know what it was. It is a further fact, Mr. President, that the people of Georgetown are against this proposition because they now say that they ought to have a station in Georgetown.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator a question suggested by the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] who made the statement that perhaps the committee was going somewhat blindly in the rush of other affairs. How long has the committee been at work upon this general proposition?

Mr. GALLINGER. Upon the general proposition of eliminating grade crossings, I will say ever since I have been a member of the Senate; certainly seven or eight years, and certainly two or three years in reference to the construction of new terminals, new stations in the city.

Now, Mr. President, one other point was made—that these damages and expenses, etc., have not been presented here to the Senate. We might have had blue prints here or we might have had pictures here, or we might have had figures that we could have stretched over the place occupied by the Presiding Officer. It was not thought necessary. It has all been figured out by the District Commissioners. It is a matter of record and it is perfectly well understood that this measure has been calculated as closely and as accurately as it is possible for men to do it. Of course with a margin on one side or the other.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator tell the Senate what is the estimate of the cost of removing the grade crossings?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going into a statement as to the exact cost of every item entering into a project that is to cost $14,000,000.

Mr. BERRY. That is a very important feature, Mr. President. The Senator said there had been accurate estimates made, and I would like to have him state, because I really do not know, what is the estimate of cost to eliminate the grade crossings.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was considered by the committee a year and a half ago that a proper proportion on the part of the District and of the Government for the elimination of grade crossings would be $3,000,000.

Mr. BERRY. That is not the question I asked the Senator. Of course, he can decline to answer if he desires. I want him to state what the estimate was of the cost of removing grade crossings.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will answer it by saying I do not know.

Mr. BERRY. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. That answers it.

Mr. President, so far as the streets about the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad are concerned, the Government and the District will come in possession of certain property there and the new structure will occupy certain other property. I have every reason to believe that it is to be a fair exchange, and that no harm will come to either the Government or the District.

The Senator from Georgia is very much troubled about the tunnel. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK], who is perhaps not a skilled engineer, but a gentleman who has had great experience in making tunnels, I take it, was very much troubled on that point. We all sympathize with his views, but as I recall the matter when the hearing was had before the Committee on the District of Columbia—I had not the pleasure of being present—the engineers gave it as their opinion that there was no trouble whatever to be apprehended in that regard. But to make assurance doubly sure they have moved the tunnel some considerable distance farther from the Library building than it was at first contemplated. I believe I am right. I will ask the Senator from Montana if that is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. That is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think we can rely upon the engineers of the Government and the District of Columbia and the skilled engineers of these railroad corporations when they say that there is no danger to be apprehended from this tunnel so far as the Library building is concerned. I presumed that we can. It is a fact that we can do very little in this world that we are absolutely sure of; there is always an element of uncertainty and doubt and of danger, and there may be a small element of uncertainty as regards this matter; but it certainly is minimized from the circumstance that these distinguished engineers say that it is absolutely safe, in their opinion. So I have no fears on that point.

It was stated here yesterday by the Senator from North Dakota, with his usual accuracy, that this tunnel would be 50 feet from the Library building, when, as a matter of fact, it will be 175 feet.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I remember distinctly—whether the Senator was present or not I do not know—when Bernard Green, the Superintendent of the Library building, was before the committee—I think the Senator was not present that day——

Mr. GALLINGER. I was not.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I asked him distinctly the question as to where the tunnel would go with respect to the Library building, and his answer was that it would be about 50 feet from the front steps or the west steps of that building. Now, if the committee have discovered their mistake, and the engineers also, and have made a change, I am very glad of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The trouble is that the Senator does not keep up with the procession.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the Senator did not begin with the procession. That is the trouble with the Senator from New Hampshire. I was stating the matter positively here, and the Senator brought into question my reputation for integrity or truth.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, not at all; it was a mistake. It was an inaccuracy.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. He charged that it was an inaccuracy of statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was simply an inaccuracy; that was all.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I wish simply to repeat—if the Senator knows to the contrary of course he should state it. Mr. Bernard Green made that statement before the committee. It was quite a full meeting. Other members who are here were at that meeting and will bear me out, I think, that that is the statement he made. That is my usual accuracy.

Mr. GALLINGER. The simple fact is, the Senator stated without qualification that it was to be 50 feet from the Library building.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It has been changed since then. I was not aware of that fact until the Senator stated here that it had been changed. I say again if the engineers and the Senator have discovered their mistake and have changed the route of the tunnel I am very glad of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before any change was made it was 150 feet from the Library building.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] has stated that we are granting these roads in perpetuity great privileges. They have those privileges now. I believe I have said that once or twice before. The only difference that we propose to make is to take them from public ground and put them on ground that will be owned by themselves. That is all. They have these rights.

Senators say that we can repeal the law and oust them; but we are not going to do it. Everybody knows that. We have not granted them any additional right nor have we taken from them any rights which they now have. They have trackage rights into two stations at the present time. They will have trackage rights into one station if this bill becomes a law. We will clear the Mall from the disagreeable condition of things which exists there, and it is very desirable that that should be done, and we will get rid of the old ramshackle Baltimore and Ohio Railroad station in the immediate vicinity of the Capitol.

Mr. President, it may be that some mistakes have been made; it may be that the best place has not been selected for this railroad station; but I submit that this matter has had the most careful and conscientious consideration by a committee of this Congress, aided by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and aided by the distinguished architects who have in charge the park system of the District of Columbia, who have given their time gratuitously to help us solve this problem. I submit that that being the fact, it is hardly competent for a Senator who is not on the committee and who has not given the matter any consideration to say that we have made such egregious blunders that the bill ought to be rejected or sent back to the committee for further consideration.

The fill that the Senator from Montana speaks of is, perhaps, an unfortunate condition, but it is to be lessened one-half, as I am credibly informed, and it will be so managed by skilled engineers that no substantial harm will come to anybody as a result of it.

Now, Mr. President, I know that Senators who are opposed to this bill are more anxious to talk about it than I am, because I certainly have said all that I care to say about it, and I yield the floor.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire I think somewhat unjustly criticises me in regard to the position I took. I made no reflection whatever upon the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, he said the committee had consideration of the bill thirty minutes. Is not that a reflection? Can it be possible that the committee——

Mr. CLAY. I meant by that the information I had when the bill was voted on. The day it was voted on it was taken up at 2 o'clock, and voted on at 2 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly that may be true.

Mr. CLAY. That was the day it was discussed in the committee room. I made no reflection whatever upon the committee. I simply said in all probability the committee, being busy, as we are frequently busy during this part of the session, did not have that time to consider it maturely.

Now, the Senator criticised me because I saw fit and proper to go over the ground where this line is to be located. Mr. President, if I deserve censure and criticism simply because I went and examined the ground that I might understand the true situation, then I am willing to accept the criticism. I believe, that in all probability, if my friend from New Hampshire will go and examine the ground critically from beginning to the end, and he has probably done it, I am sure he will get much valuable information in regard to the location of this line. He will find where these fills are to be located, and he will find instead of there being $600,000 damages that will accrue to property in all probability six or seven times that amount will accrue.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator I have been over this ground more than once, and, furthermore, these fills that are complained of are to be made at the request and almost at the dictation of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia and his associates for the purpose of accommodating the grade of certain streets.

Mr. CLAY. Then, Mr. President, I am in all probability relieved of the criticism that I went there to examine this ground, since I find that my friend the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire has done likewise. I hardly thought that I ought to be censured because I endeavored to obtain the necessary information to properly guide me in casting my vote on this bill.

In the remarks that I made I was governed simply by a desire to discharge my duty. I had no desire to make any reflection upon any member of that committee. I have nothing but the kindest feelings toward the chairman and the distinguished Senator who has just spoken.

But, Mr. President, it struck me that a measure involving so much money and involving so many streets and damaging so much property ought to be considered even for weeks. I believe that this bill ought to be debated here for ten or fifteen days. Of course we can not do it unless it is recommitted to the committee. I believe Senators ought to go and examine these grounds and see where this new line is to be located.

I understand it is said the railroad companies do not want this location. I do not know how true that is. I have no criticisms to make upon the railroads; I make none now; but it is strange to me, Mr. President, that these two roads will not accept at the hands of Congress five or six or seven or eight streets through the very heart of the city without paying a single dollar and accept at the same time $3,000,000 from Congress and $1,670,000 more to aid them in doing this work. Then the officers and stockholders of these roads have ceased to consider the interest of these corporations.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill seems to be twofold: First, to get rid of the crossings of the railroads across the streets; secondly, to build a very fine station beyond the necessities of the railroads for some particular purpose, I suppose to beautify the city.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] tells us he does not know, as a member of the committee, what it will cost to get rid of these street crossings, and yet he very promptly tells us that the people who are making these estimates consider $3,000,000 the proper part for the United States to pay. We do not know whether that is a half, a quarter, or two-thirds. It seems to me we ought to know something about that. It is one of the items that is of sufficient importance, I think, to have attracted the attention of the committee, so that we might have at least a statement of it here.

We do not know very much about this matter here. Of course nobody can tell about it by the reading of the bill. In some of these streets the railroad is to go over the street, and some of the streets are to go over the railroads. I find that quite a number of streets are to be bridged. When the street is continued the railroad company is to put up bridges.

No streets or avenues, except Ninth, Twelfth, and Fifteenth streets and New York avenue, shall be opened across the railroads constructed under authority of this act between Florida and Montana avenues and said Ninth, Twelfth, and Fifteenth streets when and as opened, shall be carried above the railroads by suitable viaduct bridges, the cost whereof with their approaches within the limits of the right of way shall be paid by the terminal company—but shall be maintained as in the case of other public highways in the District of Columbia.

That is a company, I understand, within a company, representing the railroads—

Now, I should like to have somebody tell me what kind of bridges they are going to put up. It seems to me that we ought to know whether they are to put up wooden bridges or iron bridges or stone bridges. It may be that the Senator from New Hampshire knows what the plan is; I do not, and I can not find it out from this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator in all seriousness what kind of bridges he thinks these great railroad corporations would build.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know anything about it. I know what they put out here as they come in on the Mall. It is a little, unsightly, disgraceful sort of a bridge that has been there now for a number of years, obstructing what was supposed to be one of the most beautiful parks in the city. I have not the slightest reason to suppose they will do any better than that with these street crossings.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have traveled a good deal over the great railroads of the country and I find that the construction of their bridges is usually of the best quality. I do not think there is any danger that there will be any disgraceful bridges built here. I will say, furthermore, that all this construction is to be satisfactory to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER. It ought to be satisfactory to Congress. We ought to know something about it as well as the Commissioners.

Mr. GALLINGER. If we waited until it was satisfactory to every member of this body we certainly would never have any construction.

Mr. TELLER. Of course, I am not going to criticise the committee, because I do not understand that to be exactly in order; but a reasonable bill would have contained some things, it seems to me, that would be positive as to what the character of these bridges is to be. I do not know whether the committee expended in time over it thirty minutes or thirty days. I do not know anything about it. I know it is not in the bill. I do not know where to find it. If I go down and ask the Commissioners what kind of a bridge it is proposed to build I suppose they would tell me they did not know, and they would have to consult the railroad company about it. Under the provision of the bill they will build such a bridge as they choose, and if we do not like it we can build another.

A large number of these streets are to go over the railroads and necessarily will have to be elevated. Here is a large fill. I do not remember, but I think the Senator said last night that there was about $1,700,000 to be paid by the District. I have seen the estimate made very much larger, but nobody now knows what the damage is going to be, of which the city is to pay one-half. That may amount to several million dollars. At every grade crossing where there is a bridge over the road the abutting lot owners will have a case of damage against the city. All along this fill, which I am told is to be a couple of thousand of feet long, or something like that, and whether it is 18 or 30 feet it will not make any difference, there will be a demand for damages against the District, and rightfully, too.

The District is to pay one-half of this expense. Now, suppose I should say that expense would be $10,000,000. I do not know whether it will be that amount or not. The Senator says the whole district over there is not worth $10,000,000. I think he will find out if he appraises it that it is worth a good deal, especially when you come to take men's homes and practically destroy them, for nobody wants to live under an embankment. Even if it is not more than 18 feet high, which the Senator seems to think is a very small affair, you will certainly find that $1,670,000 will not pay the damages.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. TELLER. I understand the damages are not included in the $1,670,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; the damages are included in the $1,670,000. I will say to the Senator that Mr. Richards, who is connected with the Engineer Department, who has had charge of the opening of the streets of the District of Columbia, who is a very accomplished gentleman and whose estimates heretofore have come out as accurately as could possibly be expected of any human agency, has estimated these damages, and they are based upon his estimate.

Mr. TELLER. The whole amount the Senator thinks will be $1,670,000. Nobody knows what it will be. I will venture to predict now that, if this bill passes and becomes a law, you will find that it will be a great deal more than $1,670,000.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUBOIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hold in my hand a statement published in a local paper giving a report from the District Commissioners on House bill 14148, which was a bill providing "for the appointment of a railroad commission in and for Washington, and for other purposes." The report of the District Commissioners is as follows:

The bill specifies—

Says the report—

the route which the proposed railroad terminals shall follow and fixes the location of a proposed union railroad depot. As the selection of routes within the city is a matter which demands great study and careful consideration, the Commissioners do not consider it desirable that the routes be specified until time is had to make a study of the situation and estimates of cost.

That would indicate that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia were somewhat in the dark in regard to this matter. I do not want to criticise these gentlemen, because I might incur the displeasure of the Senator from New Hampshire if I did. I will simply offer this for what it is worth.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me?

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is a report on the Senator's municipal-ownership bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. No, not at all. It is a report on a House bill. I do not know the provision of that bill beyond the fact that it provided for a railroad commission, and I think there ought to be some railroad commission to understand these questions.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be. The Commissioners, in other words, did not select that site. In this case a site has been selected at the suggestion largely of the Commissioners, and a site which the Star, the newspaper from which the Senator has read, has been for twenty years saying was the best site for a railroad station in the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know anything about the site of the station.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I read from the Times.

Mr. TELLER. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that it is desirable to have one station if you can, and I am not averse to having a very handsome station, with a fine plaza in front of it. I have in my Senatorial experience here voted for everything that I thought would beautify this city. But, Mr. President, if we are going into the beautification of the city, which I am not objecting to, I do object to one thing. I object that the District of Columbia is to pay one-half of it. Whenever we go a step beyond what is proper and necessary for ordinary business and a decent observance of the architectural taste of the country, that minute the United States should pay the whole of it.

I object, also, Mr. President, to calling upon these railroad companies for a single dollar of contribution more than is justly their part. The Senator told us last night that these railroad companies are to put in several million dollars that would not benefit them at all. If that is so, it is simply legislative robbery upon our part to take it out of them. They yield simply because they are compelled to yield. The railroad companies do not pay it; it is paid by the stockholders, citizens of the United States. If there is to be a beautiful depot here, let all the people of the United States pay it out of the general taxes that we collect, and not the owners of stock in a railroad and not the people who live in the vicinity of it.

I am quite willing that the United States should pay all that is necessary to get a fine depot. As I said before, if we require these railroad companies to put up anything more than a respectable depot, then that minute it is our duty to pay the extra expense, and not theirs. If we are giving to the railroads anything more than is necessary, then we are doing what we have not any right to do with the public funds. No one knows right now, not even the Senator from New Hampshire, what an equitable thing would be with reference to our share of this money, because he does not know what it will cost to give us the street crossings as we want to have them.

Until he knows that we can not know what we ought to pay. Practically nobody knows about it here except that we are putting into the bill what apparently on the face of it looks as if we were making a great donation to the railroad companies, and the public will believe that we do make a donation. We ought not to do it, and if we are not doing it it is unjust to the railroad companies not only to make them put in money when they ought not to pay it, but to give them a reputation that they are making a demand here which they ought not to make and which the public will think they have made.

Mr. President, I do not want to reflect on the committee, as I said, but I believe this bill would put us in a good deal better shape if it went back to the committee, and if they would take it up and determine a few things. I do not think it is any disrespect to the committee to recommit a bill. It is done frequently. I am not willing myself to support the bill in the shape it is in, yet I should like to accomplish the very purpose of this bill—that is, to get a union depot here and to get rid of these crossings; not to ask the railroad companies to do anything more than their part, but to require that they shall do just what their part is.

If there is to be any generosity at all I want to take it out of the funds of the United States Treasury and not out of the District of Columbia. We have got a lot of citizens here who have no voice whatever in this matter who are not consulted about it and have nothing to say. Of course, while it may beautify the city, it will add nothing to the small holding of some man who has a little home here. Possibly to the business men it may be of some advantage, but I do not see very well how that can be the case. I think the bill ought to be recommitted.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Colorado, and that is, I am not so sure that the railroad company will be obliged to construct a union station even if we pass this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then no harm will come.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. And we should then be left in the same situation we are now.

Mr. TELLER. Neither am I certain that they would erect a union station; but I presume they would. They would not like to stand out against an act of Congress, and probably they would do it, even if they did not wish to do it. As some seem to think they are to have a large bonus, I suppose they would not like to lose that.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. If the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was correct in his statement yesterday the railroad company is to spend $10,000,000. They might conclude not to spend it. I want to read right here the first section of this bill, and I shall take the time of the Senator no further. This bill does not reenact the law of 1901. It is a bill "to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." The first section provides:

That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, or the terminal company provided for in section 10 of the act of Congress approved February 12, 1901, entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings of railroads in the District of Columbia, to require and authorize the construction of new terminals and tracks for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in the city of Washington, and for other purposes," be, and each of them is hereby, empowered and authorized to locate, construct, etc.

It does not direct them to build, but it empowers and authorizes them. So they may not do it. They may not conclude to do it even after we pass the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from North Dakota was troubled lest this thing should be done, and now he is troubled lest it shall not be done. "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Oh, no; that is not the point at all. The Senator is very restive when anyone undertakes to disagree with him. I regret exceedingly that the Senator in the last few days has insisted upon lecturing me because I have had the temerity to come in here and oppose this proposition. It is not in very good temper and not in very good taste.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be, and I accept the rebuke with due humility, but I will say that a Senator who, after months and years of negotiation and an agreement on all hands between the District of Columbia and the railroad corporations that a union station shall be built, comes in at the last hour of the debate and says he is not sure it will be built is exploiting an avenue into which I do not wish to follow him.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will ask the Senator if he is sure that this railroad company will build this station?

Mr. GALLINGER. As sure as I am that the Senator is quibbling upon the subject.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. But there is nothing in the bill which compels them to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I can only repeat what I have said—yes; I am sure.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything on this bill, and am not as well informed about the details of the bill as I ought to be in undertaking to address the Senate. The laboring oar has largely been taken in the preparation of this bill by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. MCMILLAN], who is unavoidably absent, for reasons understood by all of us.

The problem which has confronted the committee, and which has confronted Congress for some time, has been to get the railroads from the Mall. Its presence there has been objectionable from many standpoints in the improvement and beautification of the city.

Another problem has been to get rid of grade crossings in the city of Washington. These problems were taken up at the last session of Congress, and two bills were passed for the purpose of getting rid of the grade crossings. But the problem of getting the Pennsylvania depot removed from the Mall proved insurmountable at that time. If there has been any mistake made in this matter, it was made at the last session of Congress, when very large obligations were incurred for the purpose of getting rid of the grade crossings.

As I understand—and I confess that I gave the subject attention as it was in progress before the committee, and I gave much more than thirty minutes to it, and I think every member of the committee gave much more than thirty minutes to it, notwithstanding the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. HEITFELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. HEITFELD. In justice to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], I desire to say that there was but one meeting called upon the bill, and that was called after an effort had been made to report it without a meeting of the committee, and when I objected a meeting was called in the afternoon, during the session of the Senate, and within thirty minutes the bill was reported. I at the time reserved the right to oppose it if I should see fit to do so, and two or three other Senators, as I understand, did the same. Thirty minutes is all the time the committee ever gave to the bill.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Virginia, the information I had came from such a source that I could not question it, and I am sure that all the members of the committee did not give more than thirty minutes to the consideration of the bill. Some of them may have given more than thirty minutes to its consideration, but surely I do not think all of them did.

Mr. MARTIN. Those members of the committee who did not give more than thirty minutes to the consideration of the bill neglected their duties.

Mr. HEITFELD. I desire to say that I attended every meeting of the committee of which I received notice, and if there were any meetings held of which I had no notice it was not my fault that I was not present.

Mr. MARTIN. It is impossible that my memory can be at fault when I say that this bill was considered at many meetings of the committee—not at one meeting, but at many meetings.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield.

Mr. STEWART. I am certain that I have attended many meetings of the committee when this bill was discussed. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] reported to the committee from time to time the progress he was making with the negotiations, and I suppose at least a half dozen times we had this up in committee, when he reported progress and called upon the committee to look into the subject. Every member of the committee has had an opportunity to do so, and the Senator from Michigan, who has charge of the matter, was very anxious that every member of the committee should have a full understanding of the case.

As a general proposition, I repeat, that if this is to be one of the great capitals of the world, we ought to have a respectable depot that strangers first see on coming to the city, a depot in harmony with the surroundings of the Capitol. These considerations weigh heavily with me.

I believe the best arrangements have been made by the chairman of the committee that could be made. I do not believe that anybody is a better business man than he or could have accomplished more. I regret that he is not here. This has been his especial work. At all times, when called upon as to how the negotiations were proceeding, he has been frank to tell what proceedings had been taken, and he has been carefully consulting from time to time the District Commissioners. Every question that arises is sent to the Commissioners, reported upon by them, and especially by the Engineer Commissioner, and we have had the surveyors' reports coming in from time to time and considered at different times during the whole of this session. So I do not think it is just to the chairman of the committee to suggest that this bill has not had ample consideration.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I have been present at a number of the meetings, and I am sure I do not exaggerate when I say this bill has been considered at a half dozen meetings of the committee at which I have been present.

Mr. HEITFELD. I suggest that the Senator is probably thinking of the subcommittee. I will say that it is possible, and I believe it is true, that the subcommittee did meet time and again. I do not know who are the members of ths subcommittee, but I heard there was a subcommittee in charge of the subject. So far, however, as a meeting of the full committee was concerned, there was one afternoon a meeting of the committee to listen to a discussion of one of the engineers in regard to the tunnel. This was done because the Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK] had some apprehension regarding the location of the tunnel, but no discussion of the bill was had that afternoon. The only discussion of the bill was in the afternoon to which I refer, when it was reported.

I am not making this statement because I desire to criticise anybody. If we who are members of the committee had not wanted the bill reported, we could have opposed it in the committee; but I am only saying what I do in justice to the Senator from Georgia and others who have made statements to that effect.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I am not mistaken, I am sure, in the statement that I have been present at many meetings of this committee—not of the subcommittee, but of the full committee—at which this bill has been considered.

I will say furthermore, Mr. President, that it was unfortunate that members of the committee who felt that this bill was so unwise and so objectionable should not have given the committee the benefit of their views before we reported the bill here. With the exception of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], I do not recall any antagonism in the committee against a favorable report of this bill.

Mr. HEITFELD. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to know how there could be much antagonism in a short session of thirty minutes?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MARTIN. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I did not quite catch the remark of the Senator from Virginia. I was at the time engaged in a conversation with the Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK]. Will he be kind enough to repeat the statement he made regarding me?

Mr. MARTIN. I said that the Senator from North Dakota vigorously opposed the bill, but that I did not recall that any other member of the committee had done so. That is what I said.

Mr. GALLINGER. And no member of the committee asked that the bill should be laid over.

Mr. MARTIN. No delay was asked and no time was asked for the further consideration of the bill, but the bill was reported with the understanding, of course, not that any Senator was bound to support it or obliged to support it who did not wish to do so. Members of the committee, as well as other members of the Senate, are in duty bound to oppose a bill if they do not approve of it and do not believe it is a wise and just measure.

I am not complaining of the opposition of any Senator to the bill, but I do say that I think it is unfortunate that those Senators who believed the bill to be unwise and unjust did not give their fellow-members of the committee the benefit of their views on that line, in order that we might give due consideration to those views and act upon them so far as they appeared to be meritorious.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that the bill has had every opportunity for consideration and has had the careful consideration of such members of the committee as saw fit to give attention to a matter which had been pending before the committee for months, and the District Commissioners——

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I think the Senator is possibly stating the case too strongly. He is getting two committees mixed. There was a subcommittee that had this matter in charge, and it gave it very careful attention, but the whole committee was not even consulted as to the bill itself or any of its provisions.

Mr. MARTIN. I have not said that the bill was elaborately discussed in the committee; but if it was not, it was because the members of the committee did not see fit to do so, but the bill was before the committee for consideration.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLAY. I understood the Senator to say a while ago that this bill was considered in the Committee on the District of Columbia for months and months. I understand this bill was introduced in the Senate on March 31, 1902.

Mr. MARTIN. Well, perhaps "months and months" may have been stating it a little too strongly, but the bill had been under consideration for a long time.

Mr. STEWART. The subject had been under consideration.

Mr. MARTIN. I will come to that. I know this matter has been before the committee in a number of shapes, that there have been a number of bills there, and from the very commencement of this Congress it has been more or less attracting the attention of the District Committee.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, I will state that this bill was introduced March 31, 1902, I believe, was reported to the Senate April 3, 1902, and on April 18, 1902, was ordered to be reprinted with additional reported amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will permit me——

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Virginia perhaps has forgotten that a bill was introduced long before March 31. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia recommended certain amendments, which were incorporated by the committee, and a new bill was then introduced, which is the bill to which the Senator from Georgia has reference; but the subject was before the committee in the shape of a bill long before the time he has stated.

Mr. MARTIN. I am familiar with the fact stated by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and I repeat that this subject has been having the attention of the District Committee almost from the very commencement of this session of Congress. The measure as reported may be an unwise one, it may be that it ought to be defeated. If Senators think that way, they have only to register their votes that way and defeat it; but the bill has had ample consideration in the District Committee by those members of the committee who saw fit to give attention to the subject committed to it by the Senate. The members of the committee who have not given it consideration have no right to complain of their fellow-members, but the Senate has a right to complain of them. If the bill has not been considered by the committee, let the accusation come from Senators who are not on the committee, let it not come from Senators who belong to the committee and who have had an opportunity to consider it. If they have not considered it, it is their own fault and not the fault of their fellow-members.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Montana. Mr. President, in view of what has been stated as to the consideration of this question before the committee, I desire to say that I think I attended all the meetings of the committee except two during this session of Congress. This question came up before the committee one day, when I raised the point about the proximity of the tunnel to the Library building, when the chairman said he would have the engineers present at the next meeting, or probably it may have been a day or two after, when we were to meet and consider with the engineers the questions regarding the tunnel.

I also raised the question one day with the chairman of the committee about the rights of the property holders down there, and inquired whether or not they had any objection to the bill. The chairman stated that they had had that matter before the subcommittee for weeks, and that he knew of no objection to it.

After that the question was considered, as stated by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEITFELD], just before the bill was reported, for about half an hour, or something like that. I then stated that I was willing to allow the bill to be reported to the Senate, but I reserved the right to raise these points against it on the floor of the Senate. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] also made the same reservation. I am quite confident that this matter was never considered at any other meeting of the committee when I was present, and I am sure I was absent but twice.

Mr. MARTIN. It seems, Mr. President, that the Senator was present at three meetings, or two—I could not clearly understand which from his statement—but he was at least present at two meetings, and perhaps his remarks will show that he was present at three of the meetings of the committee. If he desired to have other meetings to further consider the bill I take it he would have asked for them. I remember very well the Senator from Montana did raise a question of the too close proximity of the tunnel to the Congressional Library building and that difficulty was amply met. If the best experts in the land are to be credited, it was shown conclusively, and not a shadow of doubt was left, that the tunnel as proposed would not endanger the Library building. Mr. Green and quite a number of other experts appeared before the committee in relation to that matter.

The hour is so late that I will not delay the Senate to quote their testimony; but I invite the attention of the Senate to a report which has appended to it the testimony of the engineers. If human testimony can establish anything; if we are to rely upon the best skill in the United States to determine a technical question, it has been established that the Library building would not be in danger by reason of the proximity of the proposed tunnel. If, on the other hand, laymen are to determine this question——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. MARTIN. I do.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator that I have not heard anybody suggest in this debate that the line as now fixed is not perfectly safe.

Mr. MARTIN. I understood the Senator from Georgia to intimate a contrary opinion.

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps he did.

Mr. MARTIN. I understood the Senator to distinctly express a contrary opinion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator state what is the distance from the Library building of the proposed tunnel on the surface, and how far below the surface is the tunnel to run?

Mr. MARTIN. The distance is about 150 feet. I can not undertake to give it exactly.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] can do so.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to give the figures. My own impression is that it is about 150 feet.

Mr. GALLINGER. The distance of the tunnel from the Library building is 175 feet, and it is 64 feet below grade.

Mr. MARTIN. And at that depth the experts in the engineering profession say there is not the slightest possibility of injuring that building.

Mr. President, verifying my recollection about this matter, I will say that the first bill on the subject has been handed to me, and it appears to have been introduced on the 8th day of January, 1902. After a number of modifications were made to it, it became necessary to frame a new bill, which was introduced. Instead of amending the old bill, a new bill meeting these difficulties was introduced in the Senate, which is the bill now under consideration, but the subject was brought to the attention of the Senate by a bill as early as the 8th day of January.

Mr. President, these problems with which the committee was confronted, the removal of the railroad from the Mall and the discontinuance of grade crossings, the committee undertook to meet. They deemed the problem a very important one. The people of the city of Washington and the people of the United States have been deeply interested in having the grade crossings discontinued and the railroad removed from the Mall, where it had been put by act of Congress as far back as 1872, and since that time the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, I believe, have paid taxes on the property. In the limited time remaining at this hour of the evening I am not going to discuss the question whether the Pennsylvania Railroad Company acquired a fee-simple title to that land, but they acquired the right to hold that property under an act of Congress, and they have been holding it since 1872.

At the last session of Congress the committee was unable in a satisfactory way to get that company from the Mall and to get its structures removed. They did find a way to get rid of grade crossings, the removal of which, as I understand, was estimated to cost $6,000,000. A good deal of comment has been made on that subject. I have not the most implicit confidence in my figures; as I say, my recollection is a general one, and I have not taken the laboring oar in the conduct of this bill, but the chairman of the committee has done that.

There was, however, enough shown to me to satisfy my mind, but I have not carried the figures with that accuracy and fullness that I would if I had intended to present this matter to the Senate, though I am sure I am not far amiss when I say that the cost of getting rid of the grade crossing will be $6,000,000. The whole expense will be much larger, of course—$14,000,000 it is estimated—but to get rid of the grade crossings it was estimated that $6,000,000 would be required.

As to the justice or the injustice of the Government contributing to that expenditure, each Senator may have his own opinion; but it has been considered just and equitable in different cities where the removal of grade crossing has been proposed that the cities should contribute a share of the expense equally, I will say, with the railroads. That has been the general rule on that subject.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company was to receive under the legislation of the last Congress $1,500,000, and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company is to receive under this bill $1,500,000 to leave the Mall. It was considered they had property rights there equivalent to a million and a half dollars. So that the railroad company was paying $3,000,000 and the Government paying $3,000,000, the Government paying all of the amount to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, as it has regained possession of the Mall, and the District paying only one-half of the million and a half dollars.

At the last session of Congress it was found impossible, as I say, to get up any plan which would relieve the Mall of the objectionable structures there. That became possible only when there was a chance of merger of the Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania railroads. Those roads may not be under the same ownership. Of course I do not undertake to give the information with absolute accuracy.

One of the leading officers of the road, Mr. Green, one of the vice-presidents, stated that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company did not own a majority of the stock of the Baltimore and Ohio, but I think it is a well-recognized fact—the public, at least, accepts it as true—that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company owns so largely of the Baltimore and Ohio stock that it dominates its policy and is likely to continue to do so, so that the roads are substantially under one management, and may be viewed from the standpoint of being one stock company, and it was only when that condition was brought about that it appeared to be possible to get up any arrangement by which there could be a union depot. I say this object, which the last Congress could not accomplish, became possible at this session of Congress by the merger of these two railroads.

Now we are confronted with this condition: Unless this bill is passed the railroads will proceed, under the legislation of the last Congress, to dispense with grade crossings and to establish two depots, one on the Mall and the other near the present location of the Baltimore and Ohio depot—not exactly on that location, but very near it.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MARTIN. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. What is the Senator's understanding as to the provision of the act of 1901, which requires the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to cede to the Government certain property of which it now has possession? In view of the enactment of this pending measure, if it be enacted, what becomes of that provision in the act of 1901 requiring the cession to the United States Government of that property?

Mr. MARTIN. As I stated at the outset, I have not at my command the information that I ought to have in undertaking to present this matter to the Senate, not having expected until within the last few minutes to say a word on the subject. My information is general, just such, perhaps, as the Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] himself now has as a member of the same committee. I suppose that remains unchanged. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], in the remarks made by him some time ago this afternoon, seemed to indicate that in his judgment that requirement would lapse, and that the Government would lose the benefit of the cession of that particular property, which he estimates at about $1,200,000 in value. If that be so, it is a matter of great importance for us, I think, to consider.

Mr. MARTIN. I am very sure that is not the case, and I think that is in keeping with many other statements of my friend the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CLAY. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. MARTIN. I think the Senator from Georgia made a good many statements that he had not well considered. One was on the question of damages, when he put his judgment up here against that of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, one of them an engineer of distinction, and all of them living here in the District, men who have made a special study of this subject, who have been over the ground and calculated to a cent the cost in this matter. They have reported that $600,000 would pay all the damages resulting from this construction, and yet the Senator from Georgia estimates it at $3,600,000.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me a moment on that point?

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. BERRY. Does not this bill, in effect, do away with the provisions of the bill which was passed in 1901?

Mr. MARTIN. It does not; because where it is in conflict this bill is a modification of the law as contained in those two acts passed at the last session of Congress.

Mr. BERRY. One other question. As I understand, this bill is to be enacted to take the place of that legislation and to do away with the rights that were given to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend the depot on the ground where it now is, and to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to rebuild where their station now is. I understand that is clear, is it not?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, it is not clear, because it is not a fact. This is intended as a modification of that legislation where it is in conflict. The provisions of that legislation that are not in conflict with this legislation are not repealed, are not interfered with in any way, but only where that legislation is modified in terms by this legislation is any change made in that law.

Mr. BERRY. Why, Mr. President, it was admitted by the Senator from New Hampshire that the purpose was to get rid of that legislation which was passed a year and a half ago, and to provide for a union station instead of having two stations, and that all the provisions of those acts that are not included in this bill, I clearly understood from the bill, are eliminated. By that bill the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company was to convey certain property to the Government or to the District—to the Government, I think—and now there is nothing in this bill requiring that conveyance to be made, although all the conditions contained in that law are done away with by the present bill.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I venture to say that the Senator from New Hampshire stated what I have stated—that this bill does away with the legislation of the last session of Congress in certain respects. It does not repeal it in toto. That law is repealed or modified only to the extent that it is inconsistent with this bill. This bill contains the provision—

That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act; and all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Not a single provision of the legislation of the last session of Congress is repealed unless it is in conflict with this act.

I shall be as brief as possible. I am very sorry to detain the Senate at all at this late hour. This bill undertakes to do what the legislation of the last Congress failed to do, to the extent of having a union depot instead of two depots, removing all railroad depots from the Mall, and establishing one grand union depot. The additional cost, outside of the cost incurred by the railroad companies, is that the United States Government pays a million and a half dollars to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. The other costs amount to $1,670,000, of which the District of Columbia pays half and the United States Government the other half.

As I say, if any mistake is made, it was made in the previous Congress. What we are endeavoring to do now is to get the railroad from the Mall and to have a grand union depot here, to cost over $4,000,000; and the expense incurred, as I say, outside of the expense which the railroads bear, is one and a half million dollars paid by the United States Government alone, the District of Columbia contributing no part thereof, and an additional $1,670,000 to be paid one-half by the United States Government and one-half by the District government.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. As I understand it, we are to pay the Baltimore and Potomac road one million and a half of money to remove from the Mall, and the United States Government then takes the Mall; it becomes the property of the Government of the United States. Of course, it is the property of the United States now, but the railroad abandons it and it remains the property of the United States. Then one-half of that million and a half is charged to the District of Columbia.

Mr. MARTIN. Not at all. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from North Dakota is mistaken about that.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am asking simply for information.

Mr. MARTIN. I will answer the Senator. He is mistaken about that. The million and a half that the Government pays in connection with the removal of the structures from the Mall is paid out of the United States Treasury, and the District government pays no part of it.

Mr. BERRY. I will ask the Senator if they do not also pay the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company a million and a half?

Mr. MARTIN. That was done by the legislation of the last session of Congress, and is not under consideration now.

Mr. BERRY. It is directed to be paid by this bill, though.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not directed to be paid by this bill. It is directed by the legislation of the last session of Congress. This bill has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me a moment further?

Mr. MARTIN. I will.

Mr. BERRY. Under this new arrangement, unless the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company complies with the conditions of the last act, it is not entitled to the $1,500,000. Under this bill it is relieved from complying, but still gets the $1,500,000, does it not, which was included in the other act? That is a direct question. Is not the Government to pay $1,500,000, either under this bill or the previous act, to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company?

Mr. MARTIN. It is. It pays it under the legislation of the last session of Congress. All these expenses were taken into consideration by the District Commissioners and the engineers. Plans and specifications have been drawn, to the minutest details, and they have been verified by the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia. There is nothing haphazard; there is nothing by guess; there is nothing reckless in this bill. Every item of cost has been gone over carefully. It has not been estimated in a crude and rough way; it has been calculated to the minutest degree, to the last farthing, by the Engineer Commissioner, who is a sworn officer of the District of Columbia, and whose services were at the disposal of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The only element that is uncertain in the matter, an element which must of necessity, in every improvement of this sort, remain uncertain to some extent, is the element of damages to abutting property. The Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia has examined that question with the utmost care; he has reported to the committee, and has staked his reputation upon it—we act by virtue of his statement and by virtue of our confidence in his skill as an engineer—that $600,000 will pay those damages. Of course, he could not determine that with mathematical accuracy, because it is something that the event only can reduce to absolute mathematical certainty; but so far as engineering skill can determine it he has estimated it, and has fixed it at $600,000.

Mr. President, I do not feel justified in detaining the Senate, but I will say the defeat of this bill means to relegate the city and the country to the legislation of the last session of Congress. It means to dispense with a grand union depot here, which will, in its monumental character, be fully equal in every respect to the Capitol building itself—a larger building, in many respects—and that would be, in my judgment, a most unfortunate result. I believe it would be disastrous. It would be a disappointment to the whole country to see this bill fail and see the old law executed, giving us two depots without the monumental character that this grand union depot will have.

I believe the bill has been carefully considered; that the conclusions arrived at are just and reasonable, and that it ought to pass.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I withdraw the motion for one moment.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair in regard to the unanimous-consent agreement as to the pending bill, the measure that has just been discussed. I have an amendment that I desire to offer, and I wish to understand whether the Chair holds that it can be offered in the morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The opinion of the Chair would be, while nothing was said in relation to it in the giving of unanimous consent, that it was not the intention, when the request was granted, that amendments should be cut off, and the Chair would feel compelled to recognize the Senator to offer his amendment to-morrow morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Indiana will yield just one moment, I wish to say I made the request for unanimous consent, and I want to say to Senators that I certainly will not contest their right to offer amendments. I think they ought to have that right under the unanimous-consent agreement, although it is not specified in the agreement.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 15, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 14, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Ways and Means was discharged from the consideration of House Document 293, relating to authority to cover into the Treasury so-called retained bounty fund, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. TALBERT, indefinitely, on account of important business.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill; and pending that motion, I will ask my colleague from Louisiana if we can not agree on some limit as to general debate?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that we allow the debate to continue during the day without any limitation, and that on to-morrow we may agree upon a limit.

Mr. FOSS. I will say to the gentleman that I would like to fix a limitation to-day if we can. Would it not be agreeable to him to close general debate at the close of to-day's session? Will not that give sufficient time to the other side?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. There are a number of gentlemen on this side who desire to speak, and to close debate to-day would scarcely afford adequate time to meet their desires. I think if we were to continue general debate until to-morrow at 3 o'clock, it would perhaps afford sufficient time and be satisfactory to all upon this side.

Mr. FOSS. How much time is desired on that side?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. About five hours.

Mr. FOSS. Would it not be agreeable to the gentleman to close debate to-morrow at 2 o'clock?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. I have suggested 3 o'clock. We want about five hours on this side.

Mr. FOSS. We shall not use five hours on this side.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman permit me a suggestion? I suggest to the chairman of the committee that we proceed as we did yesterday with general debate, and if there is a little time wanted on the other side, perhaps we may be able to get through to-day. Let us proceed to-day as we did yesterday and see if we can not get through; and if not, an agreement can be made to-morrow. The chairman of the committee had two hours and a half yesterday, and perhaps others may want some time to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. FOSS. Then I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we close general debate at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon. I make this upon the suggestion of my colleague, Mr. MEYER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object, but I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana, that five hours will be desired on the other side, if the chairman of the committee has reserved time enough so that we on this side can have the time we desire. I should like an hour myself, and it seems to me if the agreement suggested is carried out, there may not be time enough. I think there are one or two other members on this side who may not get the time they desire.

Mr. FOSS. I think there will be plenty of time for the gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the chairman of the committee if he will allow me an hour?

Mr. FOSS. Oh, yes; there will be plenty of time for the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman whether he understands or intends to agree that we shall have five hours of that time upon this side?

Mr. FOSS. There has been no such agreement that that side of the House should have five hours.

Mr. VANDIVER. I understood that each member of the committee was to have an hour of time, if he desired, and I understand it is desired by nearly all the members of the committee; and therefore, unless it is so understood that we can have five hours on this side, I shall be obliged to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will admonish the gentleman that the agreement yesterday was that the time should be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. FOSS. Do I understand that the gentleman from Missouri objects to the arrangement which has been agreed upon between the gentleman from Louisiana and myself?

Mr. VANDIVER. Not if it is understood in that agreement that each of the members of the committee is to have his hour.

Mr. FOSS. The gentleman from Louisiana will control the time on that side of the House, which is provided for by this arrangement. He can parcel it out as he sees fit.

Mr. VANDIVER. Well, if he is to have the five hours I will not object.

Mr. FOSS. Why can you not leave the matter with him?

Mr. VANDIVER. I will if he is to have the five hours.

Mr. FOSS. If the matter is arranged agreeably to him, why not leave it in that way?

Mr. VANDIVER. I am willing, if it is understood in advance that he shall have the five hours.

Mr. FOSS. I think we can make an arrangement all right to close the debate at 3 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. VANDIVER. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker, unless it is understood that five hours will be allowed on this side.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSS] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, after the omnibus bill had been disposed of yesterday by sending it back to the conference committee my attention was called to a circular which had been distributed yesterday morning to members of this House—a circular signed by a man whom I do not know—whom I never met in my life—Henry H. Smith—an entire stranger to me. Now, with the greater part of this circular I have nothing to do, but I want to call the attention of the House to one part of it:

Nathaniel McKay has stated to me that he paid Representative MAHON, chairman of the Committee on War Claims, hundreds of dollars for campaign expenses and hundreds more for "good will" and services rendered. He has made similar statements as to a few other members, some of whom are not now in Congress.

That is the part to which I wish to call to the attention of the House; as to the balance, I have nothing to do with it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will observe the statement of this writer that Mr. McKay told him this. I immediately called Mr. McKay up on the telephone and called his attention to that declaration. After reading the circular this morning, he sent to me this affidavit, which I will read:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

Personally appeared before me Nathaniel McKay, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says: In a certain circular signed by one Henry H. Smith, on page 8, the statement is made by said Smith that "Nathaniel McKay has stated to me that he paid Representative MAHON, chairman of the Committee on War Claims, hundreds of dollars for campaign expenses. He has made similar statements as to a few other members, some of whom are not now in Congress."

I have had no communication with said Henry H. Smith since the year 1898, and have not spoken to him since that time. The last communication I received from him was dated August 30, 1898.

In the year 1898 I was not acquainted with Representative MAHON, and have never paid him a cent for campaign purposes in my life, and have never spoken to him in regard to his election.

In June, 1898, the said Smith wrote me a letter demanding $200, stating that he would give me full acquittance for clerical services, etc., when, as a matter of fact, he has never rendered me any clerical services of any kind whatever.

On August 29, 1898, said Henry H. Smith wrote me that he withdrew his former request for money, and that he would get a thousand dollars' more satisfaction in another way.

I will read the whole of this, although it does not refer to me:

On one occasion the said Henry H. Smith gave me a worthless check drawn on a bank where he had no account—and that brought up the controversy, and he has been hounding me ever since by misrepresentations.

The circular above referred to is not the only one put in circulation by the said Smith, but he has written books in which he has made false statements with reference to me and to which I paid no attention. He again wrote a communication to the editor of Town Topics, New York, for which I obtained an indictment against him in the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

I could have stopped the whole controversy for $200. The statements of the said Smith are made for the purpose of injuring individuals having claims before Congress. His statement to the effect that I have paid members of Congress to vote for me is false in every particular, and he has been publishing scurrilous articles against me all over the United States. I have never acceded to his demands.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 14th day of May, A. D. 1902.

NATHANIEL MCKAY.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 14th day of May, A. D. 1902.

[SEAL.]

SAMUEL E. TATEM,
Notary Public, D. C.

This same Henry H. Smith sent out the circular which I hold in my hand, headed:

The old musty "iron-clad" claims of 1862-1863.

The "fetich" of the Selfridge board "findings" exposed.

The Treasury to be looted out of $800,000 in order to give Lobbyist McKay a fee of nearly $400,000, or 50 per cent.

In regard to this circular I read the following affidavit:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, ss:

Personally appeared before me, Nathaniel McKay, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says: I have no interest, directly or indirectly, in any claim contained in the omnibus claims bill (H. R. 8587) now pending before Congress, notwithstanding the assertions contained in a certain circular issued by one H. H. Smith this morning to members of Congress setting forth that I am to receive $400,000 in fees.

That the said circular has been sent out because said Smith has been placed under indictment in the supreme court of this District for libel by me, the said McKay.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of May, A. D. 1902.

NATHANIEL MCKAY.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix my seal this 13th day of May, 1902.

SAMUEL E. TATEN,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this man says that Mr. McKay told him this story; but Mr. McKay denies it in toto. I do not know this man Smith; he is an entire stranger to me; but I want to say to members of this House that the statement he makes is absolutely false in every particular. Neither Nathaniel McKay nor any living man since I have been chairman of the War Claims Committee has ever approached me in reference to any bills—not even Mr. McKay—excepting as attorneys before the committee. I want to state further that no committee—Congressional, State, or district—has ever contributed a dollar to my election. I pay my own election expenses. I am able to pay them, and I do so.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House ten years. This is the first time I have risen to a question of personal privilege. I, like all other men who have been engaged in politics, have been attacked by papers of the opposite side, and attacked by some of my own side; but I take such attacks and make no more ado about them. But a man who will deliberately make a charge of this kind without any foundation—a man who is a stranger to me—and circulate it among members of this House—a man who will do that has a heart as black as the soot in the flues of hell; and I do not care who he is.

Now, as I said, I do not know this man, but I have investigated him. I have been making inquiries of some of the members of this House as to who he is, and I am told that he is a lobbyist, a drunken lobbyist, that he has been hanging around this Congress since he lost his position as an officer of this House; that his life is utterly worthless, and that he is a man who makes it his business to carry his point against anyone against whom he has a grievance, by issuing these circulars.

Like other members of the House, I propose to fight my own battles. As I say, I am a stranger to this man, and I denounce this as an absolute falsehood, and I propose to consult an attorney in the city of Washington before the sun goes down, and this Henry H. Smith will either retract that statement or I shall put him behind the bars. [Prolonged applause.]

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, upon the request of my colleague from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER], I ask that general debate be closed to-morrow at 3 o'clock upon the naval appropriation bill. Is that agreeable to my friend?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. That is agreeable, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as I have been assured by my colleague that this side of the House will certainly have five hours' time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed on this bill at 3 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, pending that I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if I may be accorded an hour of the time controlled by him.

Mr. FOSS. Yes; and, Mr. Speaker, I ask further that the time be controlled by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] and the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois couples with the request the further request that the time be controlled by himself as chairman and by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER].

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, on the statement of the gentleman that we are to have five hours on this side I will not object.

Mr. TATE. We already having had two.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriation for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, with Mr. SHERMAN in the chair.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that any member of this committee who may speak on the bill be also extended that privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that any member who speaks on this bill may extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBERTS. For how long is that?

Mr. PAYNE. I object to it, indefinitely.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to say that that was an order that ought to be made in the House, while individual leaves can be granted in the committee.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour to my colleague from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON].

Mr. DAYTON. Mr. Chairman, in approaching my part of this discussion of the bill providing for the naval establishment this year I do so with a sense of sadness that I can not help referring to. When I came to Congress seven years ago and became a member of the Naval Committee, it had for its chairman Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine. The ranking member on the Democratic side was Amos J. Cummings, of New York. It is a matter of intense regret that during the last year both of these gentlemen have crossed to the great beyond. The past associations with both on the part of the older members of the committee will be cherished for many years to come.

These men, in some particulars alike, in many different, were able, patriotic, and generous, and their loss to the country is a distinct one. In addition to this, within the last ten days the Navy establishment has lost one of its great admirals—William T. Sampson—who has been closely identified with the practical work of building up the Navy. His character, I undertake to say, has not been thoroughly understood by the citizens of his country, but that that character will be understood in the years to come, and that all will recognize that he was a brave man, a true man, a patriotic man, and that he did his duty well, I feel, is assured. Besides all this, in the last year the Navy Department, and this committee in its close relationship with it, has seen its Secretary, John D. Long, sever his connection with it as its chief and pass again into private life.

It will certainly be the pleasure of us all to bear testimony to the fact that there never was a more genial, kindly, or able man in public station than he. Every one of us will recognize his uniform courtesy, his calm serenity, and the ability and patriotic motives that constantly were the mainspring of his conduct. While we regret that this Secretary, one of the greatest that this country has ever known, during whose administration more than half of the naval establishment, so far as its material is concerned, was built up, is no longer at the head of the Department, all of us will rejoice that his mantle has fallen upon the shoulders of one of our colleagues in this House, and we all know from our associations with him that the Department has passed into able hands that will maintain the usefulness and greatness of the American Navy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the opening of this discussion I desire to say a few words in regard to the naval establishment and the necessity for it. Ever since the fall of Adam man has been compelled to spend a vast amount of his individual resources and energies in his own self-protection. It seems to me that we do not appreciate how much of our energies are directed in this channel. We build fences around our farms; we build walls around our cities; we build houses for ourselves, we establish law and all the machinery of the courts for the simple purpose of the protection of the citizen.

The man who presumes that the Navy is built up simply for the purpose of giving vent to the savage instinct that demands war and bloodshed makes the greatest mistake possible. We do not build navies for war. We build navies to procure and maintain peace, and the Navy is just as much necessary for the defense and maintenance of the peace of the nation as houses are necessary for the protection of the individual; just as much necessary as police are necessary for the protection of cities.

It seems to me that the saddest spectacle in American history was that one when, under one of its most enlightened intellects, and one of its greatest statesmen, Thomas Jefferson, this country deemed that all the navy it required was a few gunboats to defend our coasts. We soon found the error of that, because in a little while we were paying tribute to the pirates of Tripoli, and it was not long until the cry came forth from the American people that they had millions for defense, but not a cent for tribute. From that moment I undertake to say that the generous sentiment of the great masses of the common people of this country has been that the dignity, the honor, and the defense of this country demands a strong navy, that will command respect for us as a nation among the nations of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with close attention and with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] yesterday evening. The latter part of those remarks was to the effect that this Navy is a costly institution and that it requires large sums from the American Treasury to maintain it—thousands of dollars a day to man and run the ships when in commission. I grant that.

Liberty is always costly. Peace comes at a high price. But when we look back into our own national history and recall the fact, which every earnest, thoughtful man must admit, that the great civil war would not have occurred had we had a strong navy that could have silenced rebellion, and that we would have been saved the $8,000,000,000 and the countless lives that that struggle cost us, it seems to me all of us will recognize that in time of peace we must make those preparations that will find us strong in time of war.

Men may defend themselves upon the principle that—

> He who fights and runs away
> May live to fight another day.

But that man may be sure that the day will come when he must fight again, because his adversary, seeing his cowardice and weakness, will corner him some time with the absolute confidence that he can whip him, and he will do it; but the strong man who stands up armed and meets his adversary, and makes him realize that he is ready for that conflict, will prevent the conflict in more instances than one. That is the principle upon which we build the American Navy. It is for the purpose of maintaining peace and not for the purpose of carrying on war. That is the primary object. The secondary object is that if war does come to us we shall be prepared to meet it as a great nation ought to meet it.

Another thing in this connection, Mr. Chairman. When we build up the American Navy it must be with a sense of satisfaction that conditions have changed in this country so that the reasons given by Mr. Jefferson for the building of the gunboats for the protection of this country have passed away. We no longer are under the conditions that then surrounded us. The excuse for no Navy in those days was the fact of the limited revenues of this country and the burden of taxation upon the people.

In this day and generation it is not a question of how we shall raise revenue, but the question is, How shall we decrease the revenues that are so remarkable as to command the attention of the nations of the earth? The man who stands up on the floor of this House to proclaim that the money expended in the erection of a naval defense for this country and for its commerce is a burden upon the pocketbooks of the people of this great land of ours simply makes a statement that is laughed at by a people who are the most prosperous, and who have the most money to expend in the necessaries, luxuries, and extravagances, if you please, of life of any nation in the world.

Then, too, Mr. Chairman, I want to call your attention to another thing in relation to this work of building up the American Navy, and it, too, brings gratitude to every American heart. When we started this work under Thomas Jefferson we did not have a single shipyard in this country, and the work had to be done in foreign shipyards. At this time there is not a bolt that enters into our great battle ships, or any of our ships, if you please, the material for which does not come from American soil. It is forged in American furnaces and nailed home by the hand of American laboring men.

Every dollar, therefore, that we expend in this work is not lost, but it is simply an investment of the revenues of this country for the beneficial purpose of establishing its peace, maintaining its dignity, protecting its commerce, and giving it a proper standing among the nations of the world. [Applause.] Under these circumstances, gentlemen, I ask you if there can be any excuse for the carping, criticising cry that it is going to cost dollars and cents to do this.

When we entered on the Spanish war the Navy of the United States was scarcely known among many of the nations of the world. We were called by the Spaniards "a nation of shopkeepers;" and it was supposed that they could send their fleet of torpedo boats over to this country, rake our coasts, and bring us absolutely to our knees. Spain found out the mistake of that. Over in the Philippine Islands, at Manila, the old atlasses that were used in the schools pictured the American Republic as the size of your hand, while the Spanish dominions were made to appear as big as the side of a wall.

We do not bear in mind frequently, gentlemen, that in the history of this country there are two triumphs that have come to us. For years the agricultural growth of this country was phenomenal. Cotton was king. We triumphed in agriculture. We raised more products from the soil than any other nation in the world. Then we advanced in the manufacturing industries. Iron became king. And in the last few years we have turned the balance of trade in our favor, and we are recognized as the greatest manufacturing country on earth.

Every thoughtful man will realize that there is yet another victory that must come to the American Republic, and that victory must be when our commerce shall be, not supreme, but dominant upon the seas, and when our Navy must go to protect it, and when the United States must be first in agriculture, first in manufacturing, and first in commerce. [Applause.] We can no more expect to defend that or build it up without the strong arm of the law in its representative by the naval power than we can expect to prepare our cotton without the cotton gin, cut the wheat of the Northwest without the reaper, or raise corn without the hoe. Another thing, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to.

The world's history shows that in wars, contests—I think there is no great exception—the victories have followed the banner of that nation which controlled the sea power. Hannibal would have conquered Rome had he controlled the narrow neck of water that separated his country from that of his adversary, so that he could have made his transportation of provisions and men without that long trip across the mountains that so weakened his forces.

Napoleon would have accomplished his gigantic ambitions and rearranged the map of Europe, he would have achieved success instead of sinking all at Waterloo, if it had not been for Nelson's victory at Trafalgar; and the great civil war of this country might have had a different issue had it not been for the Monitor and the sea power of the North that closed up the South Atlantic and finally the Mississippi River, shutting off all supplies. So it is with all historic incidents.

So my appeal to-day, gentlemen, in behalf of this bill is for us not to consider, not to spend our time upon the mere criticising, carping idea that we are to cut down the naval establishment to save dollars and cents. Let us look at it from the broader and more patriotic standpoint that it is our duty to keep step with the progress of this nation; that it is our duty in this particular bill to build up this Navy, not as a means of war, but as a means of defense.

I want to say in behalf of this naval appropriation bill that I have never seen the care and attention given to any one of these measures that has been given to this one. It has been gone over in the subcommittee and in the full committee four different times. Every item in it has been carefully and earnestly scrutinized and considered. So far as I know, so far as I can see and understand, not a single thing that has been absolutely necessary has been omitted. On the other hand, not a single item has been included in it that is extravagant or that should be left out in the general items for the maintenance of this establishment.

I want to call the attention of the members of the House to another thing: There has never been in the world's history—and I challenge any man to deny this statement—there has never been in the world's history as remarkable an example of bravery, honesty, character, integrity as the Navy personnel of the United States from the beginning to this day presents to the world. No navy has such a record.

The spirit of the naval corps stands without a parallel; it stands alone in the world's history. That very thing has kept out of it any corruption. Its organization from the Secretary down has been efficient. Any of you who may have had occasion to communicate with it during the time of war could not but be impressed with how promptly information sought was given to you, and what a contrast there was between the Navy Department and some others in this particular. There is not one of you but what was impressed with the fact of the readiness of this branch of our service for that war and with its promptness when action became necessary.

My friend from Virginia criticises the organization of the Navy Department—the bureau organization. Gentlemen, I want to say to you that men will differ. I have no doubt that he is absolutely sincere in the position he takes. But to show you how far men may differ, I want to make the statement here that I have, after fair and careful consideration of this matter, reached the conclusion that that bureau organization is the very best that could possibly be obtained.

Let us look at it a moment. The Secretary of the Navy comes from civil life. There are eight bureaus, three of them alone coming from the Navy proper; three of them are filled alone by naval officers. They only fill it for a term of four years. Their appointment has to be scrutinized by the Senate of the United States and has to be confirmed by that body. The other five come from the staff division, the Engineer Corps, the construction corps, the Pay Corps, the Medical Corps. These men from these corps are selected from the very strongest and the best men. As I say, their appointments are, like other civil appointments, for a period of four years and must be confirmed by the Senate. This gives the Secretary of the Navy full control and power over these bureau chiefs.

It is not so in the Army. The Adjutant-General holds his position for life, the other heads of the Army Corps here in Washington hold their positions for life. To a certain extent they are independent of the Secretary of War and therefore he has not his hand on that organization as does the Secretary of the Navy. It is a matter of great interest—it seems to me it is a matter of great importance—that this organization should continue.

Oh, but they say it leads to additional expense, and it brings about conflicts and disagreements. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] refers to Secretary Long's recommendation in regard to the consolidation of three of these bureaus. No man will yield to Secretary Long a higher or more cordial respect or esteem than I do. But I want to say to you gentlemen I disagree entirely with him on this matter, and I have so stated to him. He abandoned any idea of this consolidation of bureaus in his last report, and substantially told us so, and since he has left the Navy, at his home, he has paid the highest compliment that could be paid to any set of men by saying that the success of his administration depended almost entirely upon the efficiency of the bureau chiefs that served under him.

Gentlemen, I would not give a snap for great, strong, earnest, brilliant American citizens in high Government places who did not disagree with each other. Disagreements as to what is best to be done are healthy. These men form a body to whom are referred the great problems of building up the Navy. They meet, they disagree, they talk, they discuss, and out of the whole sum total of their discussion comes the final result, and one of the results has been the finest battle ship that rides on any sea. It has also brought about the closest and most economical administration of naval affairs found among the nations.

It is true the duties of bureau chiefs will run once in a while close together, but ordinarily they are very wide apart. Do you not think that a man who has given his attention to steam engineering all his life is better able to tell and be held responsible, if you please, for the engines and machinery that enter into these great battle ships? Do you not think a man like George W. Melville, who made it his life study, is better able to determine upon the engineering subjects than a line officer who has had no experience of any kind or character?

Do not you think a man like Royal B. Bradford, who has made a life study of the questions of electricity, of questions of equipping naval vessels, would be better able to equip these vessels than a constructor whose whole life has been devoted simply to the study of the manufacture of hulls of vessels? And when you bring three experts together side by side, would you not rather trust their combined judgment than that of any single one of them? I say that, on this question of bureau organization, it is the three experts in their separate lines whose joint judgment is to be preferred rather than that of one man.

Then I insist on another thing. I insist that never do we want to put $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 of the Government money into the hands or under the administration of one man. One man would not be able to even answer the letters that would come to him in a single day in connection with the management of affairs so vast.

So much for this statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] as to the great extravagance and other great evils which, as he maintains, grow out of the bureau organization. In closing my remarks on this subject I want to call attention to the fact that the system which the gentleman advocates was tried and found wanting. In 1842, under Secretary Upshur, the bureaus as then organized were fixed at five.

The works of construction, repair, and equipment were under one head. Constant complaints arose upon the ground that the man who was in charge was not qualified for these separate and distinct duties. So in 1862, under Secretary Welles, and upon his recommendation, the system was changed to the present one. The modern system has been universally favored until Secretary Long made the mistake of recommending a consolidation, a return to the old policy that the Navy followed from 1842 to 1862. And the failure of the system, to which I have referred, came, mark you, when the naval appropriation bill amounted to less than three or four million dollars, while now it aggregates $78,000,000.

I quote from our hearings of last year the statement of Admiral Bradford in regard to this matter, which is so full, clear, and convincing as to set at rest all future consideration, it would seem to me.

Mr. DAYTON. I do not know that I asked the question, and I do not know what your views are in regard to it, but there is one other matter which has come before the committee, and about which I asked Admiral O'Neil, and I want to ask you—What is your view concerning the consolidation of the bureaus?

Admiral BRADFORD. I presume you refer to the proposition to consolidate the Bureaus of Equipment, Steam Engineering, and Construction and Repair

If a careful study of the history of the organization of the Navy Department is made, it will be clearly seen that the present system is founded entirely on the principle of a necessary division of duties, which, in the main, are widely separated, but which must, in the nature of things, approach and possibly at times overlap, and for which specific appropriations are made by Congress.

The present organization has been urged in the past by various Secretaries of the Navy for the reason that it has been found impossible for the duties of the Department to be performed by a less number of bureaus than now exist. Congress in the past has also recognized the necessity for the present system in order that specific sums for specific purposes may be appropriated, with individual responsibility for their expenditure. If the three bureaus referred to were consolidated into one, there would be during the present fiscal year more than $25,000,000 to be expended by one chief. It is submitted that this is too great a sum to be placed at the disposal of any single individual.

Mr. DAYTON. In your judgment better work can be obtained by having the conference of a number of the bureau heads than could be obtained by following the leadership of one man?

Admiral BRADFORD. Undoubtedly. Of the eight bureaus there are only three now with a military head who are conversant with the duties of commanders of ships and fleets. They are at present much overworked, have immense responsibilities, and probably would soon break down in time of war under the present organization of the Department. In the latter respect I speak from experience.

Mr. DAYTON. Is there any practical ground for the complaint that there is any disagreement between these bureaus involved which has caused friction, trouble, and delay in the work?

Admiral BRADFORD. There are disagreements at times between chiefs of bureaus, it is true, and there always will be disagreements among men who are conscientious, earnest, and ambitious in their efforts to advance the interests of their profession and make an honorable record for themselves. I regard such manifestations as a healthy sign. It is simple enough for a chief of bureau to have no disagreements; he has only to float with the current, as a chip passes to the sea, never to originate anything, and to allow other ambitious men to encroach upon his duties if they wish.

In the meantime his salary remains the same. In this connection I may say that I have always believed it would be wise to have a board of five officers for the purpose of harmonizing difficulties between bureaus, settle upon a shipbuilding policy, and other matters that embarrass the head of the Department on account of a lack of professional knowledge. As for delays in Government work, they are incident to Government methods of accountability in accordance with law. I believe they would be greater if the duties of the three bureaus were concentrated in the hands of one man, not subject to the criticism of others.

Mr. DAYTON. Do not these differences bring out more strongly and more forcibly the ideas?

Admiral BRADFORD. It is a proverb that "Two heads are better than one." It is the custom for the head of the Department to refer subjects pertaining to two or more bureaus to each bureau for an expression of opinion and recommendation. The result is beneficial as, on account of the rivalry between bureaus, the subject-matter is, as a rule, presented from every point of view and fully discussed. This would probably not be the result if considered by one bureau only. I have not discussed the proposed consolidation of bureaus, nor mentioned the subject in my annual reports, for the reason that I did not wish to appear as opposing a measure recommended by the head of the Department. I have, however, positive ideas on the subject, and have considered the matter a great deal in order that I might be prepared to give an opinion as to the wisdom of the proposed change in the organization of the Navy Department, should it be called for.

Mr. DAYTON. I know that, and we have the very highest respect for his views, or at least some of them, about the matter, but we want to get at what would be good for the naval service, and we thought it right and proper to call on you for your judgment; and I suppose you recognize that Congress, after all, is the supreme authority?

Admiral BRADFORD. I do.

Mr. DAYTON. I do not want you to fail to express your opinion——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. He may feel better not to have his opinion recorded, perhaps.

Mr. DAYTON. No; we want this. One of the objections made on the floor of the House last time was to "the iniquitous bureau system," as it was called, and if any such statement shall be made this year I want the statements of men whom I have not spoken to about it, but who have, by reason of their great experience, an ability to speak of that with more knowledge than those of us who have to learn such things from just such men.

Admiral BRADFORD. I believe it would be very detrimental to the interests of the Navy if the bureaus proposed were consolidated, and I will give in writing some reasons for this opinion.

During the Revolutionary war and until the year 1789 the Navy suffered many vicissitudes of direction, being at different times under the charge of a "marine committee," a "naval marine committee," a "continental navy board," a "board of admiralty," and "agent of marine," etc. It was universally admitted that these various authorities constituted by Congress to administer upon the Navy lacked sufficient professional knowledge to successfully perform the task allotted.

In 1789 a War Department was created, and both the land and naval forces placed under it. The War Department continued to administer upon naval affairs until 1798, when Congress established a Navy Department. It was stated in Congress, during a discussion of the act, that it was necessary "from a want of knowledge of naval affairs in the War Department."

The Navy Department first consisted of a Secretary of the Navy, a chief clerk, and such other clerks as were necessary. This organization continued until 1815, when, by act of Congress, a board of Navy commissioners, consisting of three captains, the highest grade then in the Navy, was authorized for the purpose of assisting the Secretary of the Navy in the discharge of his ministerial duties and for the express purpose of taking charge of all matters in reference to the construction, armament, and equipment of ships of war.

The Secretary, in asking for a change in the organization of the Navy Department, expressly stated that "the multifarious concerns of the naval establishment, the absence of wholesome regulations in its civil administration, and the imperfect execution of duties, owing to want of professional experience, lead to confusion, waste, and abuse."

The members of the board of Navy commissioners were appointed by the President and subject to confirmation by the Senate.

This organization continued for a period of twenty-seven years and was far more efficient than any previous organization. The mistake was made, however, of requiring the three Navy commissioners to act as a unit, thereby greatly limiting their capacity.

In 1842 the Department was again reorganized. After much discussion and debate a system of seven bureaus (practically the same as at present, with the exception of Steam Engineering) was recommended by the Board of Navy Commissioners to the Secretary and by him to Congress. A bill providing for such an organization passed the Senate and was recommended by the Naval Committee of the House. The House, however, reduced the seven bureaus to five by combining the Bureaus of Ordnance and Hydrography and Equipment and Construction and Repair.

When the organization was complete, the Department was divided into the following five bureaus: Yards and Docks; Construction, Equipment, and Repairs; Provisions and Clothing; Ordnance and Hydrography; Medicine and Surgery. A captain was made the chief of each bureau, with the exception of Provisions and Clothing and Medicine and Surgery.

This organization was not satisfactory to the Secretary of the Navy, who continued to recommend the seven bureaus proposed in 1842. Secretary Upshur, in discussing it in his report, after it had been in operation about six months, made use of the following language:

"The law for the reorganization of this Department has been carried out as far as it has been found practicable. The advantages of this change in the increased facilities of transacting business and in the concentration of responsibilities are manifest and great. I regret to say, however, that the system is yet very imperfect. * * *

"The bill as it passed the Senate (providing for seven bureaus) would, it is believed, have proved as complete and effective in its provisions as could reasonably be expected of any new measure running so much into details, but the changes made in it by the House of Representatives (combining Equipment with Construction and Repairs, and Ordnance with Hydrography) have produced difficulties and embarrassments in practice which were not foreseen at the time.

"The Bureau of Construction and Repairs, for instance, is charged with the duties of the Bureau of Equipment. It requires a ship carpenter to build or repair a vessel of war; it requires a naval officer to equip her.

"It would probably be impossible to find any one man properly equipped to perform all the duties of building, repairing, and equipping a vessel of war.

"In providing a Chief for the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repairs the alternative lay between a naval captain qualified to equip and a naval constructor qualified to build and repair. I did not hesitate to prefer the former, and the place is filled by a member of the late 'board of Navy commissioners.'"

Owing to the increasing importance of steam machinery, Charles H. Haswell, a navy engineer, was attached to the Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repairs in 1846, and that Bureau continued to perform the duties of the Bureau of Steam Engineering until 1862. In 1853 John Lenthall, a naval constructor, was appointed Chief of Bureau of Construction, Equipment, and Repairs, a captain having previously been chief of that Bureau.

In accordance with the recommendation of Secretary Welles and preceding Secretaries, a bill for the reorganization of the Navy Department was introduced in Congress in 1862. Senator Grimes, then chairman of the Senate Naval Committee, in presenting the bill to the Senate had a statement printed to the effect that the granting of three additional bureaus would actually cause "a diminution of the expenses of the Government" and the naval service "be made much more efficient."

The bill passed both Houses and was approved July, 1862.

The new bureaus created were the Bureau of Navigation, Bureau of Equipment, and Bureau of Steam Engineering. This organization has continued to the present time.

It appears, therefore, that the proposition now made to consolidate the Bureaus of Construction and Repair, Steam Engineering, and Equipment is one that has been tried and found unsatisfactory. In fact, the lesson to be learned from the changes in the organization of the Navy Department at various times is that expansion and specialization, rather than contraction and generalization, are necessary as the Navy is enlarged.

Since 1815 three officers of command rank have been in the councils of the Navy Department. In this respect there has been no increase, there being the same number now, all captains, but holding the rank of rear-admiral while chiefs of bureaus.

Should the three bureaus be consolidated as proposed, the chief thereof could not even read his mail, and he would be in the hands of subordinates without responsibility.

Figures are often given to prove that a consolidation of bureaus will result in economy by decreasing the number of employees. It is not claimed that an unnecessary number of employees exists now, and it is difficult to understand how a consolidation will decrease the amount of work to be performed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words in regard to the character of the Navy that we must build. Let no man deceive himself. As the chairman of our committee said yesterday, let us not get into our heads the idea that the American Navy is a finished product or that we can stand up to-day and boast of its size. No man can say but that the battle ship of the American Navy, side by side with the battle ship of any other country, will stand up equal, if not superior. But when it comes to quantity, we are sadly deficient. We have 10 battle ships, with 8 more building. England has three times that number. So it goes.

The Navy substantially must depend upon its battle line—the battle ships, the armored cruisers, and to a limited extent the protected cruisers, although those protected cruisers are not in the full sense of the term fighting machines; they are simply the messengers of the sea that go quickly from one part of the field of battle to another. I say to you, gentlemen, we are not able to stand up with our battle line against the navies of either France, Germany, or England. And when you take into consideration that Germany, according to her naval programme, will in the next fifteen years double her navy, and that England's navy is already three times as great as ours, and that she is adding to it yearly a great many more vessels than we are adding to ours, it seems to me that it is time for us to look to our battle line.

I deprecate greatly, gentlemen, an idea which has been circulated throughout this country and which we have followed to our sorrow, that there are other machines, mechanical inventions, that will do away with the battle ships. For instance, our attention is constantly being called to one type or another of what are known as submarine torpedo boats—boats that are calculated, according to human imagination, to dive under the water and come up, to send at will their torpedoes right into the bowels of a great battle ship and blow it out of the sea. And from this the deduction is made, "Oh, well, let us get a lot of these submarine boats, with which we will blow up the battle ships, and therefore it is not necessary to build any battle ships."

Gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the fact that a human being is better able to protect himself on land than anywhere else. When he stands on terra firma he has his full powers and capacities. Put him on the sea and he must necessarily lose some part of his abilities. If, then, you put him into a little narrow space where he is covered up and locked in he is deprived of another part of his power. Now, put him under water, where he can not tell where he is going or what he is doing, or whether he is going to come to the surface or not, and you deprive him of another part of his power. These inventions are mere mechanical inventions, the outgrowth of the human disposition to get something or other that will do in the nature of supernatural or unnatural things.

The great strength of a navy is its battle ship, manned by its trained seamen and its trained officers, who can stand with every faculty alert, protected by the armor of that ship and strengthened by the confidence which comes from its stability. I say that the fighting machine armed in that way is the one that will always do the most effective service. If you could have a battle ship quiet and at rest, and have one of these torpedo boats or submarine boats come under it and get its bearings and inflict its blow, the ship making no defense, then it might be possible for such a contrivance to do damage—to blow up a battle ship. But when you remember that 600 men are aboard the battle ship, that it is moving, that the tides are moving, that the currents are moving, that the men in command are looking out for all these things that may happen, I undertake to say that a submarine boat is in effect of little or no consequence in modern warfare. Every single experiment that the American Navy has tried in regard to these mechanical inventions has practically proven to be a mistake and a failure.

The Vesuvius was to accomplish wonderful things. We were to throw dynamite for miles into the forts and blow things right and left. The battle ships, too, were to be destroyed by it. But the Vesuvius proved itself in the Spanish war to be substantially of no value whatever. Then we got the ram Katahdin, which was to run with a speed that would enable it to cut with its knife-blade front right into a battle ship and destroy it. To-day the Katahdin is another illustration of the fact that it was so much money thrown away to gratify the mechanical imagination of inventors who thought they had got something that would accomplish, in a measure, superhuman things.

Now, there is another thing in this bill to which I wish to call attention and consideration of which I ask of the members of the House. We have been constantly building up the matériel of the Navy. As I stated in the beginning, half of the Navy vessels, when you take tonnage into consideration more than half, have been built during the five years of the administration of John D. Long. At the same time we have not been preparing ourselves to man those vessels, and it is an absolute fact that you may take the vessels of the United States Navy to-day and you could not officer them if they were all ordered into commission.

Every single officer taken from every single bureau, taken from every yard, and placed on these vessels would not be sufficient to man them. Why? Simply because no provision has been made for a relative increase of the officers in proportion to the increase of the vessels. This increase must necessarily be made. Some people charge the Navy of the United States with being exclusive, aristocratic, if you please. I want to say to you that the preparation of a naval officer must necessarily be different from that of an Army officer. He must not only be trained in military discipline, but he must be trained in a number of things that are necessary to make up the education of a naval officer.

Under and since the personnel bill he must know all about mechanics and machinery; he must be an engineer; he must be not only a mechanical engineer, but he must be an electrical engineer. Upon these great vessels of war we have the most complex machinery, mechanical and electrical in character, and therefore the officer must be thoroughly conversant in these things. In addition to that he must be an educated man; he must be a lawyer to a certain extent. He must be thoroughly acquainted with the principles of international law, because he does not stay here at home, but he goes to the foreign nations; and when in the foreign ports he is a representative of the Government and must be the arbiter of those questions which arise, not only of courtesy, but also of business and commerce and of the disagreements between his nation and the foreign nation.

Away back yonder, one hundred and twenty-five years ago, Paul Jones, the father of the American Navy, defined what an American naval officer must be. I quote it in my remarks, because while that article was written a century and a quarter ago by the hero that fought the greatest and most romantic battle that was ever fought in the history of the world, a battle that took to the bottom of the sea his flag in triumph flying, upon the vessel that won it, yet those remarks are absolutely true and define what the character of a naval officer should be to-day.

Mr. TAYLER of Ohio. Will the gentleman just permit an interruption? Did not John Paul Jones exhibit in his diplomatic knowledge and achievements quite as great ability as he did as a naval officer?

Mr. DAYTON. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. Why, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that until right recently no man in American history was worse misjudged or as little understood as Paul Jones. He was a statesman that stood side by side with Washington and Jefferson and Adams, and he made fewer mistakes than John Adams did. He was a diplomat, he was a gentleman, he was a scholar, and, above all things, he was as noble a patriot and as devoted to the flag of this country as any man who ever drew breath in it. [Applause.]

But let me read his letter to a committee of Congress under date of September 14, 1775, referred to:

As this is to be the foundation, or I may say the first keel timber, of a new navy, which all patriots must hope shall become among the foremost in the world, it should be well begun in the selection of the first list of officers. You will pardon me, I know, if I say that I have enjoyed much opportunity during my sea life to observe the duties and responsibilities that are put upon naval officers.

It is by no means enough that an officer of the Navy should be a capable mariner. He must be that of course, but also a great deal more. He should be as well a gentleman of liberal education, refined manners, punctilious courtesy, and the nicest sense of personal honor.

He should not only be able to express himself clearly and with force in his own language, both with tongue and pen, but he should also be versed in French and Spanish—for an American officer, particularly the former—for our relations with France must necessarily become exceedingly close in view of the mutual hostility of the two countries toward Great Britain.

The naval officer should be familiar with the principles of international law and the general practice of admiralty jurisprudence, because such knowledge may often, when cruising at a distance from home, be necessary to protect his flag from insult, or his crew from imposition or injury in foreign ports.

He should be conversant with the usages of diplomacy and capable of maintaining, if called upon, a dignified and judicious diplomatic correspondence, because it often happens that sudden emergencies in foreign waters make him the diplomatic as well as military representative of his country, and in such cases he may have to act without opportunity of consulting his civic or ministerial superiors at home, and such action may easily involve the portentous issue of peace or war between great powers. These are general qualifications, and the nearer the officer approaches the full possession of them the more likely he will be to serve his country well and win fame and honors for himself.

Coming now to view the naval officer aboard ship and in relation to those under his command, he should be the soul of tact, patience, justice, firmness, and charity. No meritorious act of a subordinate should escape his attention or be left to pass without its reward, if even the reward be only one word of approval. Conversely, he should not be blind to a single fault in any subordinate, though at the same time he should be quick and unfailing to distinguish error from malice, thoughtlessness from incompetency, and well-meant shortcoming from heedless or stupid blunder; as he should be universal and impartial in his reward and approval of merit, so should he be judicial and unbending in his punishment or reproof of misconduct.

In his intercourse with subordinates he should ever maintain the attitude of a commander, but that need by no means prevent him from the amenities of cordiality or the cultivation of good cheer within proper limits. Every commanding officer should hold with his subordinates such relations as will make them constantly anxious to receive invitation to sit at his mess table, and his bearing toward them should be such as to encourage them to express their opinions to him with freedom and to ask his views without reserve.

It is always for the best interests of the service that a cordial interchange of sentiments and civility should subsist between superior and subordinate officers aboard ship. Therefore, it is the worst of policy in superiors to behave toward their subordinates with indiscriminate hauteur, as if the latter were of a lower species. Men of liberal minds, themselves accustomed to command can ill brook being thus set at naught by others who from temporary authority may claim a monopoly of power and sense for the time being.

If such men experience rude, ungentle treatment from their superiors, it will create such heartburnings and resentments as are nowise consonant with that cheerful ardor and ambitious spirit that ought ever to be characteristic of officers of all grades. In one word, every commander should keep constantly before him the great truth, that to be well obeyed he must be perfectly esteemed.

But it is not alone with subordinate officers that a commander has to deal. Behind them, and the foundation of all, is the crew. To his men the commanding officer should be prophet, priest, and king! His authority when offshore being necessarily absolute, the crew should be, as one man, impressed that the captain, like the sovereign, "can do no wrong."

This is the most delicate of all the commanding officer's obligations. No rule can be set for meeting it. It must ever be a question of tact and perception of human nature on the spot and to suit the occasion. If an officer fails in this he can not make up for such failure by severity, austerity, or cruelty. Use force and apply restraint or punishment as he may, he will always have a sullen crew and an unhappy ship.

But force must be used sometimes for the ends of discipline. On such occasions the quality of the commander will be most sorely tried. You and the other members of the honorable committee will, I am sure, pardon me for speaking with some feeling on this point. It is known to you and, I presume, to the other gentlemen, your colleagues, that only a few years ago I was called upon in a desperate emergency and as a last resort to preserve the discipline requisite for the salvation of my ship and my fever-stricken crew to put to death with my own hands a refractory and wholly incorrigible sailor.

I stood jury trial for it and was honorably acquitted. My acquittal was due wholly to the impression made upon the minds of the jury by the testimony of my crew. * * * I do not reproach myself, but it is a case to illustrate the truth of what I have already said, namely, that the commander should always impress his crew with the belief that whatever he does or may have to do is right, and that, like the sovereign, he "can do no wrong."

When a commander has by tact, patience, justice, and firmness, each exercised in its proper turn, produced such an impression upon those under his orders in a ship of war, he has only to await the appearance of his enemy's topsails upon the horizon.

He can never tell when that moment may come. But when it does come he may be sure of victory over an equal or somewhat superior force, or honorable defeat by one greatly superior. Or, in rare cases, sometimes justifiable, he may challenge the devotion of his followers to sink with him alongside the more powerful foe, and all go down together with the unstricken flag of their country still waving defiantly over them in their ocean sepulcher!

No such achievements are possible to an unhappy ship with a sullen crew.

All these considerations pertain to the naval officer afloat. But part, and often an important part, of his career must be in port or on duty ashore. Here he must be of affable temper and a master of civilities.

He must meet and mix with his inferiors of rank in society ashore, and on such occasions he must have tact, to be easy and gracious with them, particularly when ladies are present; at the same time without the least air of patronage or affected condescension, though constantly preserving the distinction of rank.

It may not be possible to always realize these ideas to the full, but they should form the standard, and selections ought to be made with a view to their closest approximation.

In old-established navies, like, for example, those of Britain and France, generations are bred and specially educated to the duties and responsibilities. In land forces generals may and sometimes do rise from the ranks. But I have not yet heard of an admiral coming aft from a forecastle. Even in the merchant service master mariners almost invariably start as cabin apprentices. In all my wide acquaintance with the merchant service I can now think of but three competent master mariners who made their first appearance on board ship "through the hawse hole," as the saying is.

A navy is essentially and necessarily aristocratic. True as may be the political principles for which we are now contending, they can never be practically applied or even admitted on board ship, out of port or off soundings. This may seem a hardship, but it is nevertheless the simplest of truths. Whilst the ships sent forth by the Congress may and must fight for the principles of human rights and republican freedom, the ships themselves must be ruled and commanded at sea under a system of absolute despotism.

I trust that I have now made fairly clear to you the tremendous responsibilities that devolve upon the honorable committee of which you are a member. You are called upon to found a new navy, to lay the foundations of a new power afloat that must some time, in the course of human events, become formidable enough to dispute even with England the mastery of the ocean. Neither you nor I may live to see such growth.

But we are here at the planting of the tree, and maybe some of us must, in the course of destiny, water its feeble and struggling roots with our blood. If so, let it be so. We can not help it. We must do the best we can with what we have at hand.

I hope the members of this House will take occasion, if they have not already done so, to study this statement, the definition, if you please, of what a naval officer should be, made by Paul Jones.

For the reasons given by him it is necessary for us to educate these naval officers. It is necessary that this education be not only a liberal literary education, but an education in all these other things that enter into and make a part of the naval officer's life.

We have a great school at Annapolis, where this education goes on. Necessarily you can not pick up men in civil life and enlist them as officers in the naval establishment and expect them to come up to these high requirements. They must be educated, not alone like the man in one of our ordinary colleges who takes a special course, it may be in law, it may be in literary matters, it may be in engineering; but he must have an education in all of these branches, and, in addition to that, he must have an education in seamanship.

This is the sole reason why the naval organization up to this time has drawn its officers from its naval school. To meet this requirement, because of the insufficiency of officers, we have provided in this bill for 500 additional cadets to be appointed to the Naval Academy. A number of our vessels will be completed in four years. It is confidently believed that this provision will give us from 300 to 360 additional officers.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I should ask him a question here?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly not.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to know how many officers of the Navy are now detailed in the Navy Department here in this city.

Mr. DAYTON. I really am unable to tell you accurately.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have heard the statement that there are 151.

Mr. DAYTON. That is an impossibility.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; absolutely. My judgment is that there are not actual naval officers detailed in the Department here at Washington to exceed 40 or 50. If the chairman of the committee has an accurate statement, I hope he will correct me if I am wrong. There are a number detailed at Annapolis, who are engaged in instructing the cadets there.

Mr. HEPBURN. How many are there?

Mr. DAYTON. Of course there are not as many there now as there were during the session of the school. I think 51, if I counted rightly, were at Annapolis the first of this year in charge of the school there. A number of those have been detached. In fact, the class was graduated in this month, rather than in June, in order that the officers might be detached and sent to the Philippine Islands, and a number of them have already been sent there.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman remember how many cadets there were at the Naval Academy, say, about the 1st of May, at the time of the graduating exercises, whenever they were?

Mr. DAYTON. About 400, according to my recollection.

Mr. HEPBURN. So many as that?

Mr. DAYTON. I think so.

Mr. BUTLER. Is not the gentleman mistaken about that?

Mr. DAYTON. I may be. What is your recollection?

Mr. BUTLER. Between 350 and 375.

Mr. DAYTON. I may be wrong in my statement. There ought to be about 400, but there may have been some vacancies, growing out of the fact that the members of Congress had not their districts represented. I was speaking as to the number that ought to be there, but I could not speak as to the number of vacancies.

Mr. HEPBURN. How many were there in the graduating class?

Mr. DAYTON. My recollection is there were 58.

Mr. BUTLER. Fifty-eight.

Mr. HEPBURN. And 51 officers acting as professors?

Mr. DAYTON. There were 58 in the graduating class.

Mr. HEPBURN. How many professors were there in addition to the naval officers?

Mr. DAYTON. Not very many; I would not undertake to say how many, but not very many. The teaching force is almost entirely made up of officers, and this must necessarily be so, because of the fact that they have to train and discipline these cadets in seamanship and in military discipline, and in the things that make up an officer. I do not undertake to say that my statements are absolutely accurate as to numbers.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Do I understand from the gentleman that any of the recent graduates will be assigned to the construction corps?

Mr. DAYTON. I really do not know.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to ask the gentleman another question or two.

Mr. DAYTON. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman, but my time is limited.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well.

Mr. DAYTON. But I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. The question I wanted to ask is whether the course of instruction there is uniform to all the cadets.

Mr. DAYTON. It is now. It was not so formerly.

Mr. HEPBURN. All cadets have that primary information to put them in the department of constructors?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. To put them in the department of steam engineering?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; in steam engineering since the personnel bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. To put them in the department of naval engineer?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. They are all so instructed?

Mr. DAYTON. They are all instructed alike, I think.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yet only a few can serve in these various departments?

Mr. DAYTON. Simply because the number in the corps is limited by law. For example, the constructor corps so many.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. DAYTON. The Engineer Corps is a part of the line, you know.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it wise to educate all in that class, or would it be wiser to educate a certain number?

Mr. DAYTON. I think it is wise to educate them all, for the reason that you can not tell at all until after years of experience has demonstrated what a boy's capabilities will be. That is one reason why I advocated the amalgamation of the Engineer Corps and the line. Some men are in line whose natural predilections would have been for the Engineer Corps. So I think it better for them to be educated for both.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. DAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I understand the gentleman to say that this bill provides for the appointment of 500 additional cadets?

Mr. DAYTON. Yes; in addition to the present law, which goes right straight on.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will that necessitate any additional buildings or facilities for instruction?

Mr. DAYTON. No; this provision is to be extended over a period of four years. Each Senator is to have the appointment of one cadet, each Member of Congress and each Delegate under the new apportionment of next year is to have one cadet, and the President is to have 24. Under the provision of the bill 125 are to be appointed each year for four years, and the Secretary of the Navy is to determine by lot which ones shall be appointed.

Mr. SNODGRASS. They have ample facilities there now for this additional number of cadets.

Mr. DAYTON. They have ample facilities. We are already expending $8,000,000 on the Naval Academy in rebuilding.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think the provision in the bill for the selection of these cadets to be made by lot should be made absolute? I do not wish to accuse the Secretary of the Navy of partiality or anything of the kind.

Mr. DAYTON. I want to say this to the gentleman: I think I do not abuse any confidence of the committee room when I say that I have given personally a great deal of attention to this matter. To make any such provision as the gentleman suggests would increase the verbiage, and there was some objection made—not here, but elsewhere—to the provision being extended into minute details. The matter, however, was thoroughly discussed with the Navy Department, and that was the understanding, that it would be done by lot, and I supposed that would be satisfactory.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I have perfect confidence in the present Secretary of the Navy, and am satisfied with the gentleman's explanation.

Mr. DAYTON. However, the first year, because the Senate never had any cadets, theirs shall first be taken. Gentlemen will understand that the President's 24 will be divided over the four years, 6 each year, just like the rest of us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy but a moment longer. I earnestly hope, from what I have already said, that we may pass this bill without any material objection on either side. This, it seems to me, when it comes to building up the American Navy, is common ground for both sides of the Chamber to stand upon, and that politics should not enter into the consideration of these great questions. My plea is for the upbuilding of the Navy and for investing American resources in this necessary arm of defense. It is a work that we can all go hand in hand in; and for my part, I would favor a larger increase, a larger building programme this year than provided for in this bill.

But certainly there can be no objection to this programme when it is remembered that we have, with two small exceptions, two gunboats provided only for the vessels that the last Congress directed the Department to prepare and report plans and specifications for. We built none last year, and we certainly ought to have no objections to the building of these four this year. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, if I have any time remaining, I yield it back to the chairman of the committee.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BUTLER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 99) fixing the time when certain provisions of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13996) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service in the Republic of Cuba.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon the amendments to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the "Bowman Act," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. MASON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be 6,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals for the calendar year 1900, bound in cloth and wrapped; 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Resolved, That there also be printed 8,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint covering the operations of the mints and assay offices of the United States for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1901, to be bound in cloth and wrapped; 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 for the use of the Director of the Mint.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13895. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this bill will pass, but not until after there have been some efforts made to amend it, because a bill of this magnitude, dealing with so many different items, carrying so much money, can hardly be presumed to meet the ideas of all the members of the House or even of the Committee on Naval Affairs itself. There are many items in this bill that I do not indorse. I have not the time to refer to all the items on which I differ with the majority of the committee.

But, Mr. Chairman, upon an important one I desire to be heard. There is no disposition upon the part of those members of the committee whose views I share to cut down or in any way hamper the Navy Department or the development and healthy growth of the Navy itself. I indorse those patriotic utterances of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] that he delighted in giving to the House a few moments ago in eulogy of our great Navy. I do not think that he intended to say that anybody on this side wanted to cut down the Navy. I take it that there is not a man in this body who does not want to see the American Navy go on in strength and power, but there is some difference of opinion as to how rapid the strides shall be with which we advance to the final point of perfection.

I do not believe that there is anything in our environment that requires us to undertake to compete with the navy of England in the number of ships or in tonnage. While I believe to-day that we have a better Navy, a stronger Navy, a more effective Navy than Germany, I do not believe the conditions require us to measure our Navy and its strength and its glory by the navy of Germany. Under Germany's programme, which I believe was originally intended to be completed by 1916, but which I understand the chairman of the Naval Committee thinks will be completed by 1908, Germany will then have 56 battle ships. We will have more than that number of first-class machines of warfare by that time, even at a more moderate rate of increase than is indicated in this bill. We to-day have, built and building, 47 first-class machines of war, including 18 battle ships, 21 protected cruisers, and 8 armored cruisers. For all practical purposes a protected cruiser and an armored cruiser is a battle ship, whether you call it so or not. In actual war the protected and armored cruiser is as powerful as the battle ship, in my judgment, and I think naval experts bear me out. These cruisers are about as expensive as first-class battle ships.

I deny that it is necessary to take these immense strides year by year, entailing annually on the people $30,000,000 expense to increase this Navy, to say nothing of the vast sums for maintenance. The new Navy we already have has cost us about $250,000,000, and we ought to be and are proud of it.

The 6 new ships, which include 2 battle ships, 2 armored cruisers, and 2 gunboats, provided in this bill, will cost about $30,000,000. As far as I am concerned I believe we could well do with 1 battle ship and 1 cruiser, and if we should adopt the plan of building annually 1 battle ship and 1 cruiser for the next several years I think that would be fast enough to increase our Navy. European nations living right at each other's doors need to have larger standing armies than the United States; they need to be more readily prepared for war at all times than the United States, and they need greater and larger navies to defend themselves than the United States. An ocean divides us from any powerful possible enemy. Another thing: I believe some of the bureaus of the Navy Department ought to be consolidated. For instance, we have a Bureau of Construction and Repair, a Bureau of Equipment, and a Bureau of Steam Engineering, every one of which pertains directly to the building and completion of ships.

Why should they not be united? Secretary Long, who gave protracted study to this matter, earnestly recommended it. Why, Mr. Chairman, the great reason, in my judgment, why such consolidation is opposed is that the heads of these bureaus and the clerks under them do not want to lose their places, and men aspiring some day to fill these positions want the offices retained. I believe this lies at the bottom of the opposition, because if we were to conduct our business as any man of ordinary prudence would, we would consolidate these bureaus pertaining to the construction of ships, and thus save many salaries. So, Mr. Chairman, I differ with the gentleman from West Virginia on that point.

Another thing: I believe we ought to have more submarine boats, and that we ought to make provision for some in this bill. Ever since the submarine boat has been before the public I have shared the opinion that these boats are the best instrument of defense for our harbors, and I was strengthened in this opinion two years ago by the testimony of Admiral Dewey, who showed the highest respect not only for the effectiveness of these submarine boats, but for the protection which the moral force of their very presence would afford in a harbor.

I do not pretend to quote exactly, but according to my recollection Admiral Dewey testified before our committee that if he and his men had known that there were two submarine boats in the harbor of Manila, had such boats been there, the men in his fleet could never have carried their vessels into that harbor. The moral and mental strain would have been too much for human nerve. Why, sir, the reason is apparent. Is there a commander anywhere who would take a fleet into a position that meant almost certain destruction to a battle ship or to several battle ships? If a commander under such circumstances should lose a battle ship and with it hundreds of lives, historians to the remotest times would criticise him and he would be denounced throughout the civilized world for doing so reckless an act. I am reminded by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. KLUTTZ] that a late distinguished member of this committee, Mr. Cummings, was an earnest, hearty advocate of the submarine boats. Seacoast cities throughout the land want these submarine boats in their harbors. I have received many communications from Wilmington, N. C., desiring submarine boats for the protection of that city. They can not be procured until more of those boats are in our Navy.

But, Mr. Chairman, the main thing that I wish to advocate for a few minutes is the proposition to build more of our ships in the navy-yards—whether we are to build all of them there or not, certainly to build more than one in our navy-yards.

Mr. Chairman, there are members in this body who kept up with the great fight that was made against the Government paying to private factories exorbitant prices for its armor plate. There were gentlemen then in this House—and, if I recollect correctly, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. DAYTON] was one of them—who argued strongly against the position we took and in favor of allowing the conditions that then existed to continue, under which our Government would have paid the armor-plate factories $545 per ton for every ton of armor plate used by our Navy. But some of us on the Naval Committee saw fit to protest against the then existing policy and to advocate a change in the method of acquiring our armor plate.

What has been the result? Instead of paying $545 per ton—which was the lowest price at which armor plate was then offered to us—owing to the fight that we made for lower prices, although we did not succeed in having an armor-plate factory erected by the Government, yet the Government succeeded in getting armor plate at $420 per ton, plus the royalty. And by that one struggle made on this bill two years ago the Government has saved something like three million and a half of dollars upon armor plate alone.

As I understand, under the law that was then passed, there have been 37,000 tons of armor plate purchased—purchased at a cost of about $100 a ton less than these plate factories had demanded theretofore; and that reduced price means a saving to the people of this country of $3,700,000. We shall hereafter need other armor plate, and we should take steps to get it cheaper, for I believe that $420 a ton is still too much to pay for it. In the committee I unsuccessfully tried to have a provision incorporated in this bill giving the Secretary of the Navy the power to erect an armor-plate factory.

And now, Mr. Chairman, we contend for the building of more ships in the navy-yards of the Government. We believe it will save to the people of the country more money than the fight that we made for armor plate saved to the people in that direction. We believe that if this Congress will authorize the building of one of these ships to be authorized by this bill at Mare Island, another at Brooklyn, another at Boston, and another at Norfolk, we shall save a large sum of money on these ships, and that the building of these ships in this way will demonstrate to the country that the private contractors have been charging us exorbitant prices for ships; that we shall thus get data which will inform us of the actual cost of ships, and that hereafter, having this information which will be absolutely reliable, we shall be prepared to make contracts intelligently, and if we are going to continue to build up the Navy it will mean a saving of many millions of dollars in the years to come.

The question is whether we are willing to branch out in this line and try to save this money to the taxpayers of the country. We believe that it will be an economical method of building ships; that it will improve the mechanical force and the general efficiency of our navy-yards and enable us to do the repair work for the navy in a more economical manner. We believe, as Admiral Bowles believed before he became connected more intimately with the Administration as head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, that there are nine reasons which ought to induce Congress to require the building of some of our ships in the Government navy-yards. The nine reasons or advantages which Admiral Bowles gave two years ago when he was in charge as constructor of the greatest navy-yard in the country were these:

1. Maintains efficiency of force and plant.
2. Renders repair work economical and rapid.
3. Will reduce the amount of repair work by removing the necessity for maintenance of force.
4. Maintains a standard of workmanship and design on basis of practical experience.
5. Provides training for those who must inspect contractors' work.
6. No profit to be made.
7. The indirect charges in commercial practice which makes a large percentage of cost are not included, because they are already provided and are maintained for other purposes, viz: Interest on plant, taxes, insurance, depreciation and care of property, large proportion of office and organization expense.
8. Cost of inspection is saved.
9. Cost of trial trip is saved.

These were the nine reasons that Admiral Bowles gave for building ships in the Government navy-yards. I will state also that he gave nine disadvantages in building these ships in Government navy-yards, but he summed it up by saying that in his judgment it was a wise thing to build ships in navy-yards. I quote from his testimony before our committee:

I will say a few words now about the general subject of building ships in navy-yards. I recommend the building of some vessels in the important navy-yards in the United States, because I believe it to be good business, and if I owned those yards and kept them for the purposes they are now kept, I should say it would be a sensible thing to do to build one ship in each important yard all the time simply to keep them in order and maintain a sufficient force ready for all emergencies.

Then he goes on to state what yards he thinks are prepared to build these ships. I will state that in Mr. Bowles's opinion, Mr. Stahl, then the constructor at Norfolk Navy-Yard, and Mr. Baxter, who was on the Pacific coast, as I recall, concurred, all favoring the construction of ships in our navy-yards. Admiral Hichborn also, in his report dated September 29, 1900, being then at the head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, was strongly in favor of building ships in Government navy-yards. I have his report on this subject, which is as follows:

BUILDING VESSELS IN NAVY-YARDS.

Much has been said both in favor of and against the building of vessels in the navy-yards. The progress made in the improvement of yard plants and the ever-increasing need for a permanent skilled force ready for and capable of at all times taking up repairs of any character which the growth in "matériel" of the Navy entails makes it desirable that the question should be given careful consideration. There is at the present time, in view of the prosperous condition of the shipbuilding industry and the number of naval vessels building and appropriated for, sufficient work to permit the assignment of a portion of the building work to the Government yards without there being a question of the withdrawal or withholding of necessary support and assistance, through work given out, to a private industry, the maintenance of which in a high state of efficiency is unquestionably of national importance.

These conditions make it possible to eliminate from the discussion any questions of policy except such as affect economy and efficiency. It has been the history of all the iron and steel navies in existence to-day that the building of the vessels was at first entirely confided to private industry, and that the existence of the nucleus of a steel fleet made it necessary that the governments who were their owners should themselves provide for repairing these vessels; and that, having provided the necessary plant for this purpose, the provision for the maintenance of the equally necessary though vastly more difficult thing to attain, viz, efficient working organization and adequate efficient personnel, forced them to undertake in their navy-yards a portion of the new building work. The extent to which this is being done by the principal naval powers may be seen by the table below:

Nation.	Number of Government navy-yards in which building is carried on.	Number of battle ships building in Government yards.	Number of armored cruisers building in Government yards.	Number of other cruising vessels.
England	5	8	5	3
France	5	3	10	4
Germany	3	3	1	4
Russia	2	3	1	2
Italy	2	1	.....	2

In the case of many of the European nations—for example, Denmark and Holland, maintaining smaller navies—so strongly is this necessity for a permanent efficient navy-yard personnel felt that practically all the naval building work undertaken by them is carried out at their navy-yards. What they have done and are doing is mentioned here solely to emphasize the fact that the unanimous testimony of experience has been and is that the execution of a certain amount of building work at the chief Government yards is necessary to the maintenance of such navy-yard staffs as a complete and efficient naval organization requires; and that, whatever disadvantages such a course entails, they are more than compensated for in the end. It is believed that we have reached that stage in a naval development—still considerably behind our national development—which forces upon us serious consideration of this step which other naval powers have found necessary and expedient.

At the outset the disadvantages to be labored under will be considerable. Time and experience will do much toward the alleviation or possibly the entire removal of many of these. While, under existing conditions, in the case of the first vessels built in our navy-yards it may be expected that the cost will not be greatly different from—may even be somewhat greater than for—the same work executed by contract in the private shipyards, the Bureau believes that such a course once entered upon would demonstrate its desirability and practicability in an increased efficiency and economy in naval administration, regarded as a whole, without interference with a judicious policy of such Government encouragement of the shipbuilding industry as will keep the greatest number of establishments in a position to undertake and execute promptly any naval work which may be required.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am aware that Constructor Bowles, since his promotion to the head of this Bureau, has modified his opinion. It is not for me to undertake to explain that. I know not how strong the influences, or how clearer the light, or how fuller the information may be that cause a man to modify views that he entertained before becoming intimate with the Administration. Frequently we have evidences of such modifications. I do not know whether it is simply a change of judgment on the part of Constructor Bowles or a change of desires also.

I suppose I will do him no injustice to allude to a statement that has been published in one of the most reputable Republican papers on the Pacific coast, the San Francisco Chronicle, for I have not seen it denied, to the effect that the chief constructor of the Navy has contemplated some day becoming connected with private shipbuilding plants. I know not whether that is true, but if he should have the ambition some day to become the head of some great private shipbuilding concern, then I could see some reason for a change of his heart upon these matters. I could then see why he should want the Government to stay out of the shipbuilding business; I could then see why he should want the Government to continue to buy all of its ships from private contractors. That would account for a change of his wishes upon it. But I do not see that that would necessarily account for a change of judgment on his part.

As I understand, he has stated lately that building ships in public yards will cost 25 per cent more than building ships in the private yards. Now, let us consider that. What are the advantages that a private yard has as to the cost of construction over the Government yard? First, they say in a Government yard we give the mechanics fifteen days' leave of absence. Well, that is true. Fifteen days is what percentage of a year's work? Fifteen days is, I believe, about one-twentieth, which would be 5 per cent. Say that is 5 per cent added to the cost of labor. They say that in the Government yards the mechanics work only eight hours a day, while in private yards they work ten. In other words, the private yard has an advantage of 25 per cent over the public yard. Well, that added to the 5 per cent on the leave would make 30 per cent. Then, there is 30 per cent in the labor.

Now, the labor in the yards that goes into the construction of a battle ship is one-half of its cost, as I am informed; it is so estimated. Then 30 per cent of the labor is 15 per cent of the total cost of the ship. So upon that hypothesis you would find they would contend that the private yard has an advantage of 15 per cent. Now, let us see what they have to offset that 15 per cent. In the first place, by building your ships in the public yards you will have a better product, in my judgment. In the second place, the mechanics in the shipyards will be the best class of mechanics in this country working only eight hours a day, and they will do more work in eight hours than the ten-hour men will do in eight hours.

So that will diminish that per cent in some respects. Then, as Constructor Bowles says, the cost of inspection is saved, and, if my recollection is right, the cost of inspecting one of these big battle ships is from $50,000 to $75,000. So that will come off of the 15 per cent. The cost of the trial trip, which is always large, will be saved. That will come off of this 15 per cent. Then, again, no profit is to be made. I take it that certainly a reasonable man, under the evidence, will believe that as a matter of calculation in the cost these private yards can not build their ships for more than 10 per cent less than the public yards can build them. Is there anybody who believes that a private yard has ever yet taken a contract for Government work at a profit of 10 per cent? It has been asserted that private yards have made as much as 40 per cent, and even more; but suppose we assume that the private yards have been making only 25 per cent.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we ought to save at least 15 per cent in cash by building these ships in the Government yards, which will be a saving of nearly a million dollars on each great warship. Let me say that it has been demonstrated in these cards sent to the members of Congress by the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce, which cards, I believe, are in the main correct and just, that the public yards can build these ships just as cheaply as the private yards. But even if we should have to pay the same amount of money for our battle ships, who will get the profits? Why, this great army of mechanics who work in the public navy-yards would get the profits. The profits would be divided among the thousands who labor from early morn till evening, instead of going into the pockets of a dozen owners of private shipyards.

Is it not better, is it not more patriotic, that these enormous profits should be divided among the many, or else retained in the people's Treasury, rather than be given to the private shipowners, when they are no longer beggars as infant industries at our hands? The private yards are running on full time. They have more work than they can turn out upon contract time now, as I understand. They do not come to us as suppliants. They stand erect in their wealth, demanding of this Congress that we do not go into the business of building our own ships, for fear that it may take from them their great profits upon Government work.

Mr. RIXEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. RIXEY. In the interesting statement the gentleman has given us he says that the private shipyards work their men ten hours. Is it not likely that a law will be passed providing that these shipbuilding plants shall only work their labor eight hours upon Government contracts? I understand that the Committee on Labor have drafted such a bill.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman from Virginia is correct; but, Mr. Chairman, I was arguing it from the other standpoint. Our public yards are no longer in the unorganized state that they were when the Texas, the Raleigh, the Cincinnati, and the Maine were built. There is no longer a deficiency in men or in machinery, but they are to-day provided with the best machinery known to the trade. They are located on good water fronts. They have every advantage that the private yards have. This great Government of ours has invested in its public yards something like $100,000,000, and we turn out four or five million dollars' worth of repairs, when it costs us annually to maintain these yards something like eight or ten million dollars.

As Admiral Bowles said before he became the head of the Bureau, it is good business and it is good common sense to use these great plants that we have, this improved machinery that we have, the vast sums that we are compelled to pay for maintenance, in the interest of the American mechanic, in the interest of the American Navy, in the interest of the American Treasury; and no longer be held off or intimidated from this proposition by the whims and the desires of the private shipbuilders of this country, who, of course, want to continue to make millions of dollars upon the battle ships that we put upon the sea.

The suggestion that all this contest for building ships in public yards came from the Pacific coast and from the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce is not correct. Long before I ever heard of the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce I was in favor of this proposition. Long before this chamber of commerce began to send these cards the minority of the Naval Committee—the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TATE], whom I see before me; the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY], likewise before me; the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHEELER], and myself—filed minority views on the naval bill, two years ago, in which we set out at length our reasons for advocating the building of some of our ships in the Government navy-yards.

It was not a new proposition, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen on the other side can not escape from it by the cry of novelty in this matter. It is a disposition on the part of the people to relieve themselves from unjust extortion, as they believe, that is being committed upon the Government by the private shipbuilders. It is a disposition on the part of the people to use their navy-yards, not as toy establishments, but to do the great work that the Government requires. It is a disposition to maintain the navy-yards in a state of efficiency. It is a disposition to be just to the great labor organizations of this country and the mechanics who work in these yards and whose representatives have constantly favored it. This is not a new-born spirit.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that this spirit will grow, that it will increase until Congress will be compelled to adopt the proposition, in my judgment. You can not cry it down by this statement that it will increase the cost 25 per cent. What do we ask in this controversy? We ask for a fair trial of the proposition that we advocate. Give the navy-yards and the labor there employed an honest trial; and then, Mr. Chairman, if the prophecies that we have heard from the other side are true, if it turns out that it will cost 25 per cent more to build our ships in the navy-yards than it will by private contractors, then I for one will change my opinion upon it, and will say let us close the navy-yards against shipbuilding.

I would even go further than that, and would be willing that the private contractors should do our repair business as well as construction business. I do not believe it is good business to maintain this great army of mechanics in the navy-yards and expend vast sums in the maintenance of the plants, and keep vast amounts in plants, if we are only going to do four or five million dollars worth of repair work a year in them. We are asking a trial, and in order that we may have a fair trial we ask that the navy-yards at Mare Island, at Brooklyn, at Boston, and at Norfolk, that have the modern equipment, have a fair opportunity to demonstrate to the country and to the private shipyards that they can build a ship just as well and just as good a ship and build it at just as little cost as any private shipyard.

So, Mr. Chairman, it does seem that when the country has made a saving of over three millions in the matter of armor plate, against the earnest protest of many gentlemen on the other side, and when it is in the interest of the labor of the country, and patriotic members believe we can save more money by building our ships in the navy-yards than we did on the armor plate, Congress ought to yield to this demand and amend this bill so that it will require not only one ship, but these four ships that are to be authorized in this bill to be built in the navy-yards.

Mr. Chairman, the bill as it now stands authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to build all these ships in the navy-yards, if he thinks it best. If the navy-yards are not ready and prepared, he is authorized to expend a sufficient sum of money to make them ready. The Secretary of the Navy is permitted to build four ships in the navy-yards, but he is required to build one of them in a navy-yard. We have that much in the bill over what we had last year and the year before. Never until this year, since I have been connected with this great committee, have we been able to get any proposition in the bill looking toward the construction of ships in the navy-yards.

Now, there will be a motion to amend, Mr. Chairman, to increase the number of ships to be built in the navy-yards. We want more than one built in the navy-yards. If there is only one to be built the work may be hampered—it may be allotted to the navy-yard which will prove to be not the best equipped for building economically. Now, if you have the four ships built in these four different yards, there will be very apt to be one or two of those yards which would build ships cheap the first time. We would be more apt to have sufficient correct information by building four than by building merely one.

We have now many ships being built in the private yards. We have eight battle ships and several protected cruisers and armored cruisers now on the docks of private yards. So we will know what they will cost ton for ton. Now, let us do the fair thing and have all these four ships built in the Government yards. Build these four ships, so that we will have these four different sources of information as to the actual cost in the navy-yards per ton.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have discussed the proposition that I intended to discuss. I believe it is understood that we will have some time under the five-minute rule to discuss this important proposition. I now return to the gentleman from Louisiana such portion of the time that he yielded to me as I have not consumed. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I call for a quorum. We have not anyone to hear the discussion of this important matter. It is an important discussion, and there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee raises the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

During the count.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am willing that the debate shall go on, but I want the quorum to be present.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will finish the count. [After the count.] One hundred and four gentlemen present, a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, provision is made in the pending bill for two first-class battle ships, two first-class armored cruisers, and two gunboats. It has been customary to provide that new vessels authorized for the Navy should be built by contract. A departure from the established custom is made in the pending measure. By the terms of this bill the Secretary of the Navy is directed to build at least one of the battle ships or one of the armored cruisers in a navy-yard; and, further, it is made discretionary with him to build in the same way some or all of the other authorized vessels.

In its report the Committee on Naval Affairs states that—

> In view of the fact that there is some public sentiment favorable to building ships in Government navy-yards, it has been deemed advisable by the committee to insert a provision in the appropriation bill of this year leaving it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to build any or all ships in Government yards, but making it mandatory on him to construct at least one battle ship or one armored cruiser in such navy-yard as he may designate, as an experiment.

It is true that there is not only some public sentiment, but there is a widespread conviction that the navy-yards of this country should be utilized for building purposes. In both sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress vigorous efforts were made to have some provision similar to that contained in the pending bill inserted in the naval appropriation act. The movement for such legislation was not the result of hasty and ill-considered action. For some years naval architects had discussed the question; other great maritime powers had long since adopted the policy. Conditions that existed in respect to the contracts that had been made for the construction of war vessels for this Government were such that it seemed advisable that the Government should undertake building operations in its own yards, so that a comparison might be instituted as to the character of the work done in private yards, as well as the prices charged therefor.

I may be pardoned if I express at this time my personal gratification at the committee's action in placing a mandatory provision in the bill for the building of at least one vessel in a Government yard. For more than three years I have devoted much time to the study of the question. Early in the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress I became convinced that the wise and proper policy for this Government was that followed by Great Britain and the continental powers. To secure the adoption of such a policy I offered amendments to the naval appropriation bills in both the first and second sessions of the Fifty-sixth Congress which, if adopted, would have distributed the shipbuilding operations of the Government among the private and the Government shipyards. Continued investigation of the question has only strengthened my convictions, and naturally I am pleased to find the Committee on Naval Affairs incorporating such a provision in this bill.

Perhaps it would have been more nearly correct had the committee justified its action not upon the existence of some favorable public sentiment, but upon the widespread and almost universal expression of the existing public sentiment that was brought to the attention of the committee. Exhaustive hearings were held during the first session of the last Congress, to determine the advisability of building at navy-yards. Since then very little additional information has been contributed, and such that has been so contributed is the fruit of individual research and investigation. The diffusion throughout the country of the facts ascertained at those hearings, however, has awakened public interest to such an extent that the question can no longer be ignored nor evaded.

Upon two other occasions in this House I have discussed at some length the advantages and disadvantages of building at navy-yards. Briefly summarized, the advantages are that the mechanical force, the plant, and the shops of the navy-yards are maintained in an efficient condition; that it is possible to conduct the repair work more economically and rapidly; that the Government is enabled to maintain a high standard of workmanship and design, to which contractors can be made to conform; that the men detailed to inspect the work placed in private yards are trained in the most practical and thorough manner to render effective and satisfactory service to the Government; that there is no profit to be made, and the total cost is thereby so much lessened; that the indirect charges which exist in commercial practice and which make a large percentage of the cost—for instance, interest on plant, taxes, insurance, depreciation, care of property, and a large percentage of office and organization expenses—are not included in the Government charges; and that the cost of inspection, which when vessels are built by contract is very large, is saved to the Government.

The experience of the past has demonstrated that if no actual combination of the different shipbuilding plants in the country has existed in fact, that in nearly every instance when bids were invited for vessels authorized by the different appropriation acts an understanding, or, perhaps, a "gentlemen's agreement," had been made regarding the amounts of the bids to be submitted by those estimating and submitting bids. This I will undertake to show a little farther on in my remarks. So that an additional advantage resulting to the Government from the building in the navy-yards of some of the vessels authorized from time to time is that after the policy is once inaugurated it will be impossible for contractors to obtain excessive prices for the building of naval vessels.

It is not my purpose at this time to enlarge upon the advantages to be derived by the Government by the building of some vessels in navy-yards; my object, rather, will be to refute some additional arguments advanced against this policy.

Lately it has been urged with some flourish that the Government yards are not sufficiently equipped for building purposes; that they lack facilities possessed by all private plants doing Government work; that the lack of sufficient water by reason of the narrowness of the streams and other bodies of water upon which navy-yards are located would prevent, or, rather, make impossible, the launching of a battle ship or armored cruiser; that the Government would be unable to adopt the practice followed in all private establishments of purchasing large quantities of materials in the open market whenever the prices were favorable and retain such materials until required in the prosecution of some particular work; that the eight-hour law, under which mechanics in the navy-yards work only eight hours a day, as against a ten-hour day in the private yards, would result to the very great disadvantage of the Government, and that the fifteen days' annual leave which mechanics in Government yards now receive would increase the cost of work in Government yards to an enormous extent.

Careful investigation has convinced me that the only two of the above-enumerated objections that have any merit whatever is that urged because of the difference in the hours that a mechanic works in a Government yard and in a private yard and the increased expense resulting from the annual leaves. In a Government yard a day's work consists of eight hours; in most of the private yards, ten hours; in some few, for some branches of trade, especially the metal-working trades, nine hours. In my opinion the extra cost of labor in the Government yards is largely offset, if not more than offset, by the profit that goes to the contractor. If a choice must be made between these two, then my choice is already made. I prefer that Government expenditures be distributed among a great number of mechanics for a reasonable day's work than to two or three or a selected few engaged in the shipbuilding industry at the expense of the mechanics employed by them.

While on this point I wish to make one further observation. In estimating the increased cost by reason of this difference in the number of hours that constitutes a day's work, it has always been claimed that the navy-yards are at a disadvantage which amounts to a difference of 25 per cent of the amount paid for labor. This computation undoubtedly would be correct if a man would do 25 per cent more work in a day of ten hours than he does in a day of eight hours.

I have been credibly informed, however, that representatives of some of the concerns which within a recent time have shortened the workday of mechanics engaged in the metal-working trade from ten to nine hours a day have expressed the opinion that the results are so much more satisfactory under the new conditions that they would under no circumstances return to the ten-hour day, so that it is fair to insist that whatever disadvantages the Government yards may be under from the shorter day it can not with certainty be said that it equals 25 per cent of the cost of the labor.

Mr. BELL. May I suggest to the gentleman that the Industrial Commission took evidence in Salt Lake as to the eight-hour workday, and the managers of every coal mine and practically of every metalliferous mine in the State, including the smelters, all swore that they got as much work now from the men in eight hours as they formerly got in ten or twelve.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that fact is generally recognized.

Mr. BELL. Only one man could be found among the employers of labor who disputed that proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is generally recognized that during a fair day's work covering a fair length of time the mechanic or laborer accomplishes better results than in a day the duration of which overtaxes his capacity for work.

Mr. BELL. The manager of the P. V. coal mine, a very large institution, stated that the machines broke as much coal now in eight hours as they formerly did in ten, and the mule drivers took as much out now under the eight-hour system as they formerly did under the other system.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is another thing that should be considered. There has been pending before Congress for some years a bill to compel contractors doing Government work to limit the day of labor to eight hours. I am firmly convinced that it will not be long before the pressure of an enlightened public opinion will result in the passage of that bill, and as soon as that proposition becomes a law this objection will be completely obviated.

Opponents of the policy of building at navy-yards have placed much stress upon the fact that under the law passed during the last Congress employees in Government yards get fifteen days' annual leave with pay. It is true that under the operations of that law the cost of work done in Government yards is somewhat increased. Under no circumstances, however, can it exceed 5 per cent of the total cost. Besides the fifty-two Sundays in each year there are seven holidays upon which no work is done in the navy-yards. This leaves three hundred and five working days, 5 per cent of which are used for vacations, so that the fifteen days' leave with pay can not increase the cost more than 5 per cent.

This increase, however, is only on the cost of labor, and considering the increase in its relation to the entire cost of the ship, in all probability it does not amount to more than 3 per cent. During the hearings had in the Fifty-sixth Congress, the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Long, stated that it cost twice as much and took twice as long to build in the navy-yards as it did in private plants. No figures have ever been adduced to support this statement. During the present session, Secretary Long produced a memorandum signed by Chief Constructor Bowles, in which he said:

> In my judgment, a vessel built in the navy-yard under existing conditions as to administration, wages, hours of labor, leaves of absence, etc., would cost by the least estimate 25 per cent more than if built by contract.

Until the Chief Constructor gives detailed figures to justify this statement it serves no useful purpose to challenge it. With this statement of Admiral Bowles, however, I wish to place another made by him in November, 1897. In that month Naval Constructor William J. Baxter, United States Navy, read a paper on navy-yard expenses at the fifth general meeting of the Society of Naval Architects and Marine Engineers. After the paper had been read it was discussed by members of the society present, among others by Admiral Bowles, who said:

> When Mr. Baxter wrote this paper, he wrote a very moderate and plain statement of the facts as they are to-day. Now, the facts ought not to be as they are to-day. The navy-yards ought to be properly organized, and they can be organized without much difficulty; and, further, I would guarantee that if I had three months to start it I could do in the New York Navy-Yard what can not be done in any organization in this country—I could build ships cheaper than anyone can, and I know it.

Since that time the condition of the navy-yard at Brooklyn, as well as of all the navy-yards in the United States, has been vastly improved. Every year since then large sums have been spent for the purpose of improving the plant and facilities at the yards. If, five years ago, Admiral Bowles could build war ships at the Brooklyn navy-yard more cheaply than they could have been built anywhere else in this country, with the superior facilities that exist at that yard at the present time, including the finest machine shop in the United States, completed since that statement was made, there should be less difficulty in doing the same thing to-day.

In the hearing in March, 1900, the Admiral made the following statement to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which it may be advisable to quote at this time:

> I will say a few words now about the general subject of building ships in the navy-yards. I recommend the building of some vessels in the important navy-yards of the United States because I believe it to be good business; and if I owned those yards and kept them for the purposes they are now kept I should say that it would be a sensible thing to do to build one ship in each of the important yards all the time simply to keep them in order and maintain a sufficient force ready for all emergencies.
> If the ships are built in that way and under the present system of management, I believe that they will exceed in cost those built outside; but I believe you can fully afford to pay that additional expense for the advantages obtained, and those advantages are fully worth the money that will be paid. That is my general view of the attitude that ought to be taken toward the navy-yards of the United States, but I want it clearly understood that I do not believe in building ships in every out-of-the-way navy-yard that we may have.

Whatever may have caused the chief constructor to shift on this question, or apparently to shift, I have only to say that the statement of no man in this country will be accepted as conclusive upon the relative cost of building in private and Government plants unless substantial reasons are given upon which such opinions can be based.

For the convenience of this discussion I shall consider together the objections that the Government yards are not sufficiently equipped for building purposes; that they lack facilities possessed by all private plants doing Government work; and that the Government would be unable to adopt the practice followed in all private establishments of purchasing large quantities of material in open market whenever the prices are favorable, to be utilized in the prosecution of work then under way or thereafter to be obtained.

Let me call attention first to two letters from Admiral Bowles, dated April 11, 1902, submitted by Mr. DAYTON to the Committee on Naval Affairs. In these communications the Admiral states that with an appropriation of $175,000 for the preparation of a building slip with overhead traveling cranes and power communications the New York Navy-Yard would be in proper condition to build a battle ship or cruiser. An appropriation of $225,000 for the Norfolk yard and the Mare Island yard would place those yards in condition to build. In these communications he also points out the condition of the Boston, the League Island, and the Portsmouth navy-yards.

The most effective way to determine whether these yards have the requisite equipment for building purposes is to compare their condition with some of the private yards wherein Government work is under contract. I have in mind a yard which has contracts for five naval vessels. I undertake to say that the facts when stated will excite at least some astonishment. At the outset I desire to emphasize that I have no prejudice against the concern about which I intend to speak at some length. I raise no issue as to its ability to perform satisfactory work. My purpose is merely to show the absolute worthlessness of some of the arguments that have been made against the utilization of the Government yards for building purposes.

The Fore River Ship and Engine Company, of Quincy, Mass., is located on the Weymouth or Fore River, which is tributary to Hingham Bay, Boston Harbor. This company has been awarded contracts to build two battle ships, a cruiser, and two torpedo-boat destroyers. The total of these contracts aggregates $8,437,000. The vessels that are under contract to this company have all been authorized since March, 1899. If the contentions of those who oppose war-ship building at navy-yards be correct, then the Fore River Ship and Engine Company with contracts aggregating almost eight and a half millions of dollars should be one of the best and most completely equipped shipbuilding plants in the country. It should also be in a position to go into the open market and purchase great quantities of materials whenever the prices are favorable and retain those materials until work is secured on which they can be used.

It should also be located at a place where there is ample water. I have in my hand a copy of the Saturday Evening Post issued on the 19th of April, 1902. This is an illustrated weekly magazine founded in 1728 by Benjamin Franklin and published in Philadelphia. It has an advertisement inserted by the Fore River Ship and Engine Company, in which the public is invited to subscribe for stock in the company. Let me read from this advertisement:

If you would behold the American spirit in its purest, strongest, and most buoyant phase, catch it on the wing, so to speak, learn the rate at which things under its inspiring influence can be made to happen, and see how truly robust and promising an infant is a shipbuilding plant reared under its guidance at the tender age of 22 months, go to Fore River.

At Fore River two things have been going on—the building of ships and the installing of a plant to build them. Logically, the plant should come first, of course, but as a matter of fact the two enterprises have been carried on so side by side and intermingled that the ships, during the confusion, have managed somehow to come out ahead. This is most distinctly an American way of doing things—to start at nothing, to keep moving at all hazard, and decide upon conveniences and methods afterwards.

No even-minded European could ever proceed in such a manner, yet the scheme is a good one, economical, and not without foresight.

This distinctly American spur-of-the-moment way of getting a great plant together is one of the principal reasons for our being so many years ahead of the rest of the mechanical world.

It seems to me that this statement completely refutes the argument heretofore urged against the navy-yards, that they are not as well equipped as private plants.

This advertisement, however, contains much more instructive information. Let me read again from it:

Work in progress in Fore River Yard April 1, 1902.—Battle ship New Jersey, 15,000 tons; battle ship Rhode Island, 15,000 tons; cruiser Des Moines, to be launched May, 1902; torpedo-boat destroyer Lawrence; torpedo-boat destroyer Macdonough; seven-masted steel schooner (11,000 tons displacement), the largest sailing vessel in the world, to be launched May, 1902; forgings for steamships now being built in other yards; steel bridge, 800 feet long, over Weymouth Fore River; 75 sets forgings for rapid-fire guns; miscellaneous structural work. The above, with other work in hand, will bring the total amount of contracts up to $8,907,000.

The company states that its total contracts amount to $8,907,000. Just a moment's consideration of this statement. The contract price of the New Jersey, one of the battle ships building at this plant, is $3,405,000. The contract price of the Rhode Island, another battle ship, is $3,405,000. The contract price of the Des Moines, the cruiser building at this yard, is $1,065,000; of torpedo-boat destroyers Lawrence and McDonough, $281,000 each, or for both, $562,000. The total of the Government contracts aggregates $8,437,000, not including the prices of the 75 sets of forgings for rapid-fire guns.

The report of the Commissioner of Navigation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, shows that by its own statement the Fore River Ship and Engine Company on June 15, 1901, was building no vessels except under Government contract. It further appears from the report that on the 25th of June the company signed a contract to build a seven-masted steel schooner of 6,000 tons, to be completed in February, 1902, and to cost ready for sea about $250,000.

Outside of the Government contracts, not including the 75 sets of forgings, and the contract for building this vessel, this company, according to its own statement, has not more than $270,000 worth of contracts. This advertisement goes on to point out that this Ship and Engine Company offers for public subscription 10,000 shares of preferred stock with a bonus of one share of common with every two shares of preferred purchased. The capitalization of the company is $4,000,000, equally divided into preferred and common stock, of which only $2,000,000 ($1,000,000 of each) have been issued.

It further appears that the preferred stock is a 7 per cent stock, and that the earnings of the company have been such that in the five months prior to January, 1902, they have been at a rate of over $100,000 in excess of the amount required to pay the dividend on the entire $2,000,000 preferred stock, and this without the advantage of having in the business the $1,000,000 which will result from the sale of the stock offered in this advertisement and while at the disadvantage of constructing and continuing to complete the plant and works. I hope that no one will think that I am trying to promote or boom this company. Nothing is further from my purpose. I am trying only to point out what "an awfully good thing" this class of Government work must be when this company is able to do all it says with practically no work except Government contracts.

Mr. ROBERTS. This is a Massachusetts company. That is a good thing, too.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not surprising that there has been such strenuous opposition to the movement to have war ships built in Government yards. Here is a company able to earn 7 per cent on $2,000,000 preferred stock and 5 per cent on $2,000,000 common stock, of which at least $1,000,000 is water, and at the same time accumulate enough to build its works. It would seem to reasonable men that with plants as well equipped as are the navy-yards, the profit on such work, which many have believed to be quite enormous, will more than offset the disadvantages under which the Government is alleged to labor.

A question naturally arises at this time, which I prefer should be answered by some one opposed to the policy about to be initiated. Until explained, I feel justified in ignoring the arguments that private plants take advantage of the market to purchase large quantities of materials to be utilized at some future time, when other work has been secured.

How does such a company as the Fore River Ship and Engine Company, which is seeking so assiduously for capital with which to complete its plant, find the necessary means with which to make purchases of materials for which they have no immediate and really no prospective use? And this in the face of the fact that it offers a bonus of common stock to subscribers to its preferred stock. It has been my belief that, except in trifling instances, no such practice is followed; and this belief has been strengthened by reason of my inability to obtain any convincing proof of the existence of the practice.

Another objection recently urged with much force is the impossibility of launching armored cruisers or battle ships at the different navy-yards of the country. Of the several navy-yards at which it has been believed there was adequate equipment to undertake building operations that at Norfolk was the one against which this objection was urged most persistently. It was based upon the fact that the width of the body of water on which the Norfolk yard is located was not sufficient to permit the launching of a large cruiser or battle ship. It might be sufficient to dispose of this objection merely by a reference to the statement contained in one of the letters of Admiral Bowles, heretofore referred to, in which he says, "at the Norfolk Navy-Yard it is possible to launch a battle ship or armored cruiser."

This objection, however, may just as well be disposed of now, completely and effectually. Permit me again to refer to the location of the Fore River Ship and Engine Company. Until within about two years the plant of this company was located on the Fore River just below the Braintree bridge. About two years ago the company removed its plant, or rather changed its location, to Quincy Point, at the junction of Weymouth Fore River and Town River.

The annual report of the Chief Engineer of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, states that—

Before improvement Weymouth Fore River was navigable at low water 4 miles for vessels drawing 18 feet, and the least low-water depth 3 miles farther was 3 feet. The existing project, approved by the act of September 19, 1890, and extended by the act of August 18, 1894, is to attain in Weymouth Fore River a navigable channel 6 feet at mean low water for a distance of 7,000 feet, 100 feet wide to near Weymouth Landing—which carried the improvement beyond the present location of the Fore River Ship and Engine Company plant.

Town River, which sweeps past Quincy Point into Weymouth (Fore) River, is described in the same report as—a small tidal tributary to Weymouth River, flowing into Boston Harbor. Before improvement it had a narrow, crooked channel with a least depth of 1½ feet at mean low water. The existing project is to dredge a channel 4 feet deep at mean low water, 100 feet wide, and 4,500 feet long to the head of navigation.

Everything connected with this engine and shipbuilding plant, it seems to me, must be most disheartening to those who have relied upon the objections enumerated by me for their opposition to building operations in navy-yards. Of course it is apparent, even to the most casual observer, that this Fore River Ship and Engine Company is not situated at a place where either the depth or the breadth of the waterways upon which it is located can be pointed to with exultation by the opponents of navy-yard shipbuilding. It seems peculiar that so much weight has been attached to this objection. It is a well-known fact that on the Clyde, where some of the greatest shipbuilding plants in the world are located, the river is so narrow that it has been necessary to build a number of turning basins.

If it were necessary to launch a vessel from five to six or seven hundred feet in length endwise into a stream only 100 feet wide, many shipbuilding plants would never be able to place even a moderate-sized vessel into the water. Some of these plants have built their slips obliquely instead of at right angles to the rivers, but the more progressive American genius has not been content with such an arrangement. The Scientific American for April 12, 1902, contains an article by Waldon Fawcett on broadside launchings. Let me quote from that article:

The launching sidewise of steel vessels of large dimensions is distinctively an American practice. The development of the idea in its application to vessels of considerable size has occurred on this side of the Atlantic, and, indeed, this is the only country where the plan is followed to any considerable extent. Broadside launchings have always been the rule at the shipyards on the Great Lakes, and of late years have been introduced to some extent in shipbuilding plants on the Atlantic coast.

The side launching is not claimed to have any advantage over the more common mode of getting a new hull into the water, but the adoption of the method has been dictated by limitations in the depths and areas of the waterways which have been available for launching at shipyards where this scheme has been employed. In other words, a vessel may by means of the broadside method be launched into a slip or river so shallow and narrow that the reception of the hull would be practically impossible were it sought to slide the vessel into the water endwise, as is the custom at yards possessed of a generous extent and depth of water.

Further on in the article it is stated that—

There appears to be almost no limit to the size of vessels which may be successfully launched broadside, as several vessels, each approximately 500 feet in length, have been placed in the water in this manner.

It is further pointed out that at the plant of the William R. Trigg Company, at Richmond, Va., it was necessary to launch into a canal 100 feet in width and not exceeding 18 feet in depth.

It has never been claimed that the constructors in the Navy are lacking in genius, ability, or capacity. They have planned and designed and superintended the construction of the most effective fighting machines afloat, and I, for one, am firmly of the belief that the same genius, the same ability, and the same capacity displayed so highly in those fields in which they have been given opportunities will make just as brilliant a showing in every other field in which they may properly be exercised.

So much for the objection that it is impossible to launch battle ships or cruisers at navy-yards.

Early in the course of my remarks I stated that I believed that I could show that heretofore there has existed an understanding or a "gentlemen's agreement" as to the bids that should be submitted for naval vessels authorized by Congress. Without some such understanding it would be an utter impossibility for such similarity as is found to exist in the bids submitted from different firms. In 1893 the Newport News Company, never having bid upon naval work prior to this time, apparently was not deemed of sufficient importance to be considered. Upon gunboats Nos. 7, 8, and 9, now known as the Nashville, Helena, and Wilmington, the following bids were received:

Bidders.	Gunboat No. 7.	Gunboats Nos. 8 or 9.	Total for 7, 8, and 9.
Maryland Steel Co	$370,000	$370,000	$1,110,000
Union Iron Works	400,000	350,000	1,100,000
Newport News Co	280,000	280,000	840,000
J. H. Dialogue & Co	395,333	395,333	1,186,000

Secretary of the Navy Hon. H. A. Herbert, in his report for 1893, speaking of these bids, said:

These bids are very much lower than ever heretofore received by the Government, but before accepting any of them the Department is having all the plans examined by a second board.

The contract was given to the Newport News Company.

In 1895 the following bids were received for the battle ships Kearsarge and Kentucky:

	One vessel.	Two vessels.
Cramps	$2,820,000	$5,500,000
Union	2,740,000	5,380,000
Newport News Co	2,350,000	4,500,000

On their first effort the Newport News Company bid $270,000 less on three gunboats than the theretofore successful bidders; two years later on two battle ships their bid was $1,000,000 less—20 per cent of the entire cost of the two vessels—than that of the Cramps and the Union Iron Works. That bid was effective. Competition proved too expensive. A different state of affairs prevailed thenceforth.

I do not care to encumber this speech with too many statistics, so I shall insert for the purposes of comparison only the amounts for which contracts were made for 6 vessels during the year 1901. And, in doing so, I wish to call attention to the fact that whereas in 1895 the difference in the bid of the Newport News Company and the Cramps on one battle ship was about $500,000, in 1901 the difference is only $5,000. More than that, the same difference of $5,000 is found in the bids which they submitted on six armored cruisers during the same year, each receiving two of the vessels and the Union Iron Works receiving the other two.

And for the construction of three protected cruisers the bids of the Newport News Company and Neafie and Levy Company and the Cramps were exactly identical, to wit, $2,740,000, the Union Iron Works receiving a contract for one of the vessels for $2,825,000. Under the provisions of the naval appropriation act, which authorized these vessels, one of them was to be built on the Pacific coast, providing that the cost did not exceed 4 per cent more than the amount of the lowest bidder. The bid of the Union Iron Works was well within the 4 per cent provision, and the contract had to be given to it. These figures, in my judgment, are conclusive of the existence of an understanding among the different shipbuilding concerns of the country regarding naval contracts.

Mr. RIXEY. Does the gentleman know any reason why the provision giving a differential preference to shipbuilding establishments on the Pacific coast should be continued in the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that it is claimed it has been necessary to get material for these vessels from the Far East; and in order to encourage and build up the shipbuilding plants on the Pacific coast this differential in favor of the Pacific coast concerns has been inserted. It is in the nature of a subsidy or a bounty or a gratuity from the Government.

Mr. RIXEY. Does not the gentleman think that the shipbuilding plants on the Pacific coast are now old enough to stand upon their merits without any differential in their favor?

Mr. FITZGERALD. After what I have pointed out about the Fore River Engine Company, I think these shipbuilding plants can make a reasonable profit at any place without any such provision of law. It is difficult to imagine what would have happened had the Newport News Company been taken into the arrangement in 1893 and thus avoided cutting the price on three gunboats and two battle ships to the amount of $1,270,000, which was nothing else than additional profit.

Statement of proposals for the construction of three protected cruisers, Nos. 20, 21, and 22, authorized by the act of June 7, 1900, received under the Department's advertisements of December 1, 1900, and March 6, 1901.

I have now exhausted the objections which I stated at the outset it was my intention to answer or to explain away. Two other great objections constantly urged against navy-yard construction is the excessive cost and the greater time for completion of navy-yard built ships. The comparisons heretofore made were between vessels built in private establishments and those built in Government yards at a time when the yards were absolutely barren of equipment. There are some additional considerations, however, which should not be overlooked at this time.

The Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair in his annual report for the year 1901 states that the Department's attention—has been specifically called to the probability of two years' delay in the completion of the 5 battle ships of the Virginia class and the 6 armored cruisers of the Pennsylvania class.

These vessels had just been begun when the report was compiled, and under the contracts for their construction were to be completed within thirty-six months from the date of the contract.

The reason given for the probable delay is the inability of the armor-plate manufacturers to provide the armor required for the vessels mentioned within the time required for their completion under the contracts.

The chief constructor further points out that the responsibility for such delay rests with the Government and renders it liable to suits for damages by the ship contractors. Members of this House who were in the Fifty-sixth Congress recall that a bill passed this House sending to the Court of Claims for adjustment claims of this character of the Cramps alone which aggregated more than a million dollars. This is an item of expense of very great proportions which would be entirely eliminated from the cost of vessels under construction at navy-yards.

The report of the chief constructor for 1901 further shows that the following vessels were the following number of months behind contract time of completion on July 1, 1901:

Battle ships.—Illinois, 3 months; Missouri, 17.2 months; Maine, 15.5 months; Ohio, 19 months.

Protected cruisers.—Denver, 3.8 months; Chattanooga, 6 months; Tacoma, 9 months; St. Louis, 6 months; Des Moines, 5 months; Galveston, 9.5 months; Cleveland, 1.5 months; Milwaukee, 2 months.

Monitors.—Arkansas, 15.1 months; Florida, 12 months; Nevada, 11.4 months; Wyoming, 9 months.

Torpedo-boat destroyers.—Bainbridge, 18.5 months; Chauncey, 31 months; Decatur, 19.3 months; Hull, 20.4 months; McDonough, 16.9 months; Perry, 19.8 months; Stewart, 26.7 months; Whipple, 19 months; Barry, 20 months; Dale, 20 months; Hopkins, 18.4 months; Lawrence, 16.9 months; Paul Jones, 19.1 months; Preble, 20.5 months; Truxtle, 19 months; Warden, 19 months.

Torpedo boats.—Stringham, 30.4 months; Blakely, 22.4 months; Nicholson, 23.6 months; Thornton, 23.5 months; Wilkes, 25.5 months; Goldsboro, 33 months; DeLong, 22.4 months; O'Brien, 23.1 months; Tingey, 27 months.

Submarine torpedo boats.—Plunger, 5.1 months; Grampus, 5.7 months; Pike, 5.2 months; Shark, 4.4 months; Adder, 5.9 months; Moccasin, 4.9 months; Porpoise, 4.4 months.

This statement shows that 48 vessels have been delayed beyond the time for completion, as required by the contracts, from one to thirty-three months. Under such circumstances the time required for the completion of such vessels under the terms of the contract can not be considered when estimating how long it takes to build a ship by contract. Reference was made during the debate yesterday to the fact that representations have recently been made to the Navy Department by a number of contractors having contracts for the construction of torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers, to the effect that the contractors will lose more than $2,000,000 on these various contracts, and that they desire the Government to share these losses with them by paying more than a million dollars in addition to the prices for which the contracts were awarded.

I have seen it stated that at the time these contracts were made naval constructors warned these contractors that it would be impossible to complete these boats for the prices submitted. This has some bearing upon the subject urged yesterday that there is no guaranty of performance from navy-yard-built ships. It seems to have been overlooked that the naval constructors design the vessels in their minutest details, including speed requirements, displacement, etc. They place a limit upon the cost, and not within ten or twelve years have contractors refused to take contracts at prices within the estimates of the naval constructors.

It will not be out of place to call attention at this time to a report made by Rear-Admiral Melville, Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, in 1892. It was in reference to the machinery and boilers of the cruisers Raleigh and Cincinnati. Admiral Melville pointed out in that report that the cost of building the machinery and erecting it on board the vessels would be considerably less than the original estimates on which the contractors had refused to bid as being too low for the amount of work required.

He calls attention, too, to the fact that bids were requested for the furnishing of certain flange plates. The only bid received was for $81,200. The Department directed that the work be done at the New York Navy-Yard, the result being that the total cost of the flange plates completed was $51,081.50. Admiral Melville's own words in reference to this matter are worth quoting:

> Expressing the above figures in words the Government has obtained these flange plates ready for assembling in the boilers for $18,418.48 less than was bid for the same work, and has a hydraulic flanging machine to boot.

The flanging machine and the cost of erecting it amounted altogether to $11,700. This is but one instance of many that might be cited where the Government yards have demonstrated their capacity to compete favorably under any conditions with private establishments.

The chairman of the committee yesterday stated that one of the cards issued by the Chamber of Commerce of Vallejo regarding the value of the navy-yard plants was misleading. No one who examined the card with any care whatever could have been misled by it.

From his own report it appears that the value of the navy-yard plants is about $80,000,000, and it can not be disputed that the expenditures for maintenance and for improvements at the various navy-yards for the year ending June 30, 1901, aggregate some $10,000,000, while the repair work done did not exceed $5,000,000 or, at the outside, $6,000,000.

These yards can easily be utilized in a manner that will be more beneficial to the Government. With very little, if any, additiona. expense of maintenance the amount of work done at the navy-yards of the United States can be more than trebled. It is a well-known fact that the machinery of such plants deteriorates very quickly when not used constantly. Unless the yards are to be utilized to their fullest capacity, it is the greatest legislative folly conceivable to continue to appropriate vast sums for their improvement and maintenance.

Great Britain and the continental powers do not build war vessels in the government yards out of any desire to "stifle genius." The policy of every maritime power worthy of the name, excepting the United States, has been to build new vessels in government yards. I have here a statement furnished by the office of Naval Intelligence, which gives the number and kinds of naval vessels building for England, France, and Germany, with tonnage and estimated cost, and showing whether building in government or private yards.

Number and kinds of naval vessels building for the principal foreign powers, giving tonnage and estimated cost and showing whether building in Government or private yards.

From this it appears that Great Britain, France, and Germany distribute their building operations very evenly between government and private establishments.

I have never urged that all Government constructions be done in navy-yards. I do not favor that policy now. In my opinion sufficient of the vessels authorized from time to time should be placed in the navy-yards for construction for the purpose of enabling the plants to be maintained in an efficient and economical manner, and as a check upon private concerns. This is not a blow at private enterprise. It will in no way cripple or injure any industry.

Two years ago I called attention to the fact that the Commissioner of Navigation in his report for 1899, after stating that our greatest annual production of ocean steam vessels was for the year then just closed, when it amounted to 43,871 gross tons, asserted that the construction "of 100,000 tons of ocean steel steamships (including those of the coasting trade) in addition to the naval contracts and contracts in other Government vessels on which they are engaged would overtax the present capacity of our shipyards.

His report for the year ending June 30, 1901, shows that the gross tonnage of ocean-going vessels built during that year in the United States aggregated 82,709 tons. The shipbuilding plants of the country are within easy reach of sufficient work to overtax—if not already overtaxed—their plants. The placing of some of the naval work in the Government yards can do no harm to them. It is beyond dispute that three of the Government yards are equipped for building operations, and I hope that all three of them will be given an opportunity to demonstrate their capacity and efficiency in the construction of three of the vessels authorized in this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration provides for the building, by contract, of 2 first-class battle ships, 2 first-class armored cruisers, and 2 gunboats. The Secretary of the Navy is directed to build at least one of the battle ships or armored cruisers in one of the Government navy-yards, and, in addition thereto, discretion is vested in the Secretary of the Navy to build any or all of the ships authorized by the bill in such Government navy-yards as he may designate. The provision making it mandatory that at least one ship be built in one of the Government navy-yards is a move in the right direction, but, in my judgment, it does not go far enough.

The committee in its report says that there is some public sentiment in favor of the building of ships in the navy-yards, and for the purpose of making the experiment it was deemed advisable to authorize the construction of at least one ship in one of the Government navy-yards. There is not only a strong public sentiment throughout the entire country in favor of building ships in the Government navy-yards, but there is a deep-rooted belief also that the time has now arrived for the Government to utilize its expensive navy-yards for the purpose of building as well as repairing its ships.

The value of the real estate and chattels of the 33 navy-yards and naval stations, according to the report accompanying the bill, is $71,409,162.21, and of the machinery $7,559,451.72. The value of the real estate and chattels, as also the machinery in eight of the largest Government navy-yards, is as follows:

Navy-yard.	Real estate and chattels.	Machinery.
Portsmouth	$3,070,842.05	$473,896.69
Boston	12,712,149.23	844,925.85
New York	21,306,010.37	1,438,374.99
League Island	3,562,722.56	325,802.68
Norfolk	6,313,919.67	803,164.57
Pensacola	1,781,450.99	134,580.94
Mare Island	5,387,301.86	660,146.49
Puget Sound	941,993.80	255,122.21
Total	55,076,391.93	5,046,014.43

making a total of $60,122,404.35, practically a larger sum of money than is invested in all of the private shipbuilding plants in the United States. Appropriations are being made from year to year by Congress for the improvement of these plants, and most of the yards are now in a condition to compete, and compete successfully, with any of the great private shipbuilding plants of the United States. If it costs, as it is claimed, 40 per cent more to build a ship in the Government navy-yards than in the private yards, it will cost at least 40 per cent more to do the repair work upon the ships in the Navy; but there is no foundation in fact for this statement.

The Texas, built at the Norfolk Navy-Yard, is always singled out as an illustration of the great cost of building ships at the navy-yards, but at the time the Texas was built the Government navy-yards were run under a system radically different from that of to-day. The change was just being made from wooden to iron ships. The yard was not properly equipped. Most of the men employed were not skilled mechanics, and many of the men working at the yard were placed there through political influence.

Many of the tools that were furnished to the yard were charged to the construction of this ship. But notwithstanding the lack of experience and of modern tools and appliances, and notwithstanding the great delay, the Texas was successfully built, and to-day is one of the best ships in the United States Navy. She cost complete $4,202,121.49. There is no ship in the United States Navy of the same class as the Texas with which we can make a comparison except the Maine, her sister ship. The Maine was built in the New York Navy-Yard and cost $275,667.26 more than the Texas, but she was a heavier ship, and her displacement was 367 tons more than that of the Texas.

There is one ship, however, built in one of the private yards of the country with which we can make a comparison, and that is the Columbia. The contract price for hull and machinery of the Columbia was $2,725,000; she cost complete $3,909,011.26. She was built by the Cramps, and went into commission April 23, 1894. She received a speed premium of $350,000 and has cost for repairs since completion $147,449.18. She is now practically in the scrap heap, being used as a receiving ship in the New York Navy-Yard.

The Texas went into commission August 15, 1895, and has cost for repairs since the date of completion $124,682.81. The Texas, built at the Norfolk Navy-Yard, is to-day one of the best fighting machines in the United States Navy, while the Columbia, built at one of the private shipbuilding yards at a cost to the Government of nearly $4,000,000, is to-day used as a receiving ship at the New York Navy-Yard. The displacement of the Columbia is 7,375 tons and her gross tonnage 5,552.48 tons. The displacement of the Texas is 6,315 tons and her gross tonnage 4,050.31 tons.

To make a further comparison we will take the case of the two-turret coast-defense monitor Monadnock, built at the Mare Island Navy-Yard, and to which the chairman of the committee referred in such strong terms in the course of his remarks yesterday, and the two-turret coast-defense monitor Monterey, built at the Union Iron Works, San Francisco. The Monadnock was authorized under the act of August 3, 1886, and the Monterey under the act of March 3, 1887. The Monadnock, according to Senate Document No. 175, cost for hull, machinery, etc., $1,526,268.65, and for armor to hull, equipment, etc., $607,785.83, making a total cost of $2,134,054.48.

Originally the contract for the construction of the Monadnock was awarded to the Continental Iron Works, but for some reason the work was not completed by this company, and the Government subsequently took the uncompleted hull and finished the work at Mare Island Navy-Yard. There was paid on account of the hull under the Robeson administration $574,490.

When the hull was delivered to the Mare Island Navy-Yard a great portion of the work had to be done over, and it would have been cheaper for the Government to have begun anew. Adding this amount to the figures given in Senate Document No. 175, and we have as the entire cost $2,708,544.48. From this should be deducted for a set of boilers never installed, $112,000, making the total cost $2,596,544.48.

And right here I want to say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that no criticism can justly be made of the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce. It has simply exercised the right that every citizen in the United States has, and that is the right of petition. All the members of that chamber are well-known, reputable citizens. I know them all, and I know that under no circumstances would they knowingly make a misstatement or try to mislead the House or any member thereof.

The figures as to the cost of the Monadnock are taken from the report of the Secretary of the Navy as contained in Senate Document No. 175, less the sum of $112,000 for a set of boilers never installed. Deducting this amount, and it leaves a difference of only $2.65 between the figures given out by the Vallejo Chamber of Commerce and those of the Secretary of the Navy.

The people of Vallejo are deeply interested in the building of ships in the Government navy-yards. Most of the mechanics employed at the yard reside in Vallejo, and if Mare Island ever gets an opportunity to build a battle ship or cruiser, and I believe that she will, you will find that the mechanics at that yard, even though they work but eight hours a day, will turn out one of the best fighting ships and one of the speediest in the American Navy, and it will be built just as cheap if not cheaper than it could be built in any of the private ship-building yards.

The Monterey was built under contract by the Union Iron Works, and according to Senate Document No. 175 the hull and machinery cost $1,861,232.69. To this should be added inspectors' charges of $20,000 and the penalty remitted by Congress in 1901 of $32,823, making a total of $1,914,055.69. To this should be added the amount paid for armor to hull, gun protection, equipment, trial-trip expenses, etc., $900,138.37, making the total cost of the Monterey $2,814,194.06.

The Monadnock was commissioned February 20, 1896, and the Monterey was commissioned February 13, 1893. The gross tonnage of the Monadnock is 1,608.26 tons, and the gross tonnage of the Monterey is 1,589.74 tons, a difference in favor of the Monadnock of 18.52 tons. Up to August, 1898, the time of the arrival of these monitors at the Asiatic station, the Monadnock cost the Government for repairs the sum of $48,658.30 and the Monterey $70,902.34; and from August, 1898, to January 1, 1902, the Monadnock cost for repairs $86,946.96 and the Monterey $75,149.48—a pretty fair showing, especially when you consider that the yard was without modern tools, that many of the men were unskilled mechanics placed there by political influence and under political pressure, and that the appropriations at times were not sufficient to keep the men employed over two or three months during the year.

In a number of instances the navy-yards of the country have successfully competed with private yards for Government work, and in so competing have saved the Government large sums of money. As an illustration I cite the case of the Mare Island Navy-Yard. On October 30, 1885, bids were opened for the removal of the cofferdam in front of the dry dock at Mare Island. The bids ranged from $39,750 to $50,000. All of the bids, however, largely exceeded the amount allowed.

New bids were received on November 28 following, at which time 10 offers were made ranging from $15,000 to $49,975. The $15,000 bid was from an irresponsible firm and was rejected. The other bids being excessive, the civil engineer of the yard undertook the work, and did it for $20,492.19. About the same time a set of boilers was required for the dry-dock pump house. The lowest bid was $26,200. This sum being regarded as excessive, the boilers were built in the shop of the engineering department at the yard at a cost of $19,000, or $7,200 less than the lowest bid.

One of the private shipbuilding yards in San Francisco offered to build a 100-ton pair of shear legs for $80,200. This offer was declined and the work was done at the yard for $44,375, including the foundation. And this is not all. The Government was charged, as is claimed, excessive prices for repair work on some of the transports in San Francisco. It was rumored that there was a combination on the part of the private shipbuilding yards, and the navy-yard was called on to furnish estimates.

It was generally known that the yard was to furnish estimates, and when the bids were put in for repairs on the transport Sheridan it was found that the Risdon Iron Works bid $293,000, to do the work in 117 working days; the Union Iron Works, $291,525; the Mare Island Navy-Yard's estimate was $289,150, to do the work in 150 working days, and the Fulton Iron Works bid $285,675, to do the work in 112 working days. The contract was awarded to the Fulton Iron Works, but it took 180 days to do the work, 30 days more than was estimated by the Mare Island Navy-Yard. The difference in price between the Fulton Iron Works and the Mare Island Navy-Yard was only $3,475.

Subsequently bids were called for for repairs on the transport Sherman. W. A. Boole & Son bid $399,045, to do the work in 90 working days; Fulton Iron Works bid $390,000, to do the work in 110 working days; the Risdon Iron Works bid $385,000, to do the work in 100 working days; the Mare Island Navy-Yard estimated $367,771 if teek was used, and $361,771 if Oregon pine was used, the work to be done in 75 working days; the Union Iron Works bid $384,900, to do the work in 75 working days, or $337,497.50, to do the work in 90 working days. The contract was awarded to the Union Iron Works, and the transport Sherman was, owing to a strike in that yard, on the ways for nearly a year before she was delivered to the Government.

Bids were also called for for repairs on the transport Logan. The Fulton Iron Works bid $65,850, to do the work in 90 working days after the receipt of the material; the Risdon Iron Works bid $69,100, to do the work in 100 days after the receipt of the material; The Union Iron Works bid $70,337.50, to do the work in 100 working days after the receipt of the material, and the Mare Island Navy-Yard estimated $33,072, to do the work in 40 working days after the receipt of the material—$32,728 less than the bid of the lowest bidder. The ship was sent to the Mare Island Navy-Yard for repairs and she did the work within the estimate and within the time specified.

If it is a fact that it costs the Government 40 per cent more to build its ships in the navy-yards of the country than in the private yards, it naturally follows that it must cost the Government 40 per cent more to do the repair work. If this is the case, the sooner the Government closes its navy-yards and allows the work to be done by private contract the better it will be for the taxpayers of the country; but this is not the case, as the figures just given demonstrate.

The mechanics and foremen employed at the Government navy-yards are just as skilled and just as intelligent as those employed in any of the private shipyards, and I bar none. Political influence will not at the present time avail a man in securing work in any of the Government navy-yards. Under the rules and regulations of the Department preference is given to the veterans of the civil and Spanish-American wars and to former employees of the yard in good standing. All persons desiring work at the navy-yards must register, and they are employed in the order of registration.

If upon trial they are found to be incompetent, they are at once discharged, and the result is that we now have in the Government navy-yards an efficient and skilled class of mechanics. The foremen are all under civil service and are some of the best men in the United States. As an illustration: At Mare Island Navy-Yard eight of the foremen were foremen at the Union Iron Works when the Oregon was constructed. Many of the mechanics employed at the yard worked on the Olympia and Oregon, admittedly two of the finest ships of their class in the American Navy. There is no inducement to slur work in the Government yards, and all the work turned out by these yards is of the highest order.

I do not advocate the building by the Government of all of its ships in its navy-yards, but I do believe that the time has now arrived for the Government to build at least some of its ships in its own yards for the purpose of demonstrating that it can build just as cheaply if not cheaper than the private yards, and above all, for the purpose of preventing a combination and consolidation of the private shipbuilding yards.

The bid of the Newport News Shipbuilding Company on the Kearsarge and Kentucky was nearly a million dollars less than the bids of the Cramps and the Union Iron Works. This was before the Newport News Company entered the combination and is another illustration of what competition will do. The Government exacts but eight hours a day from its employees in its yards; the private yards from nine to ten hours a day; and if I had my way I would insist upon the Government inserting in every contract made by it with private shipbuilding concerns a clause that none of the men employed in the building of Government ships shall work to exceed eight hours a day.

All the guns used by the Navy are manufactured in the Government navy-yard at Washington, and the same is true of the guns used by the Army. Until recently the Navy Department paid for smokeless powder 90 cents a pound. The Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance recommended the establishment of a gunpowder factory, and an appropriation was made therefor.

The factory was built and experiments were made in the manufacture of smokeless powder. The two powder factories supplying smokeless powder to the Government were informed that unless they reduced their price to 75 cents per pound the Government would manufacture its own powder. The result was that the price was immediately reduced. Numerous other instances could be cited, but to my mind these are sufficient. None but American citizens are employed in the navy-yards of the United States—no foreigner is permitted to work in these yards—and it is a wise regulation.

At the last session of the Fifty-sixth Congress a bill was passed giving to the mechanics and laborers employed in the navy-yards of the Government fifteen days' leave of absence with pay. The private shipbuilding concerns who have been fighting the bill providing for an eight-hour law on all Government work were in favor, so I am informed, of the bill giving fifteen days' leave of absence with pay to the employees of the navy-yards, and are favorable to the bill recently introduced, giving to the same employees thirty days' leave of absence with pay.

The employees of the yards have not asked for the passage of such a measure. All they ask for is steady, permanent employment, and many of them have protested against the bill allowing them fifteen days' additional leave of absence with pay. They would prefer to have Congress authorize the building of some of the ships by the Government in the Government yards rather than to have fifteen or thirty days' leave of absence with pay. England, Germany, France, Italy, and Russia build ships in the Government navy-yards, and there is no reason why such a course should not be pursued by this Government.

Many of the private shipbuilding yards of the country are congested with work, and one yard alone at the present time has 1 first-class battle ship, 2 armored cruisers, 1 monitor, 2 unarmored protected cruisers, 3 torpedo boats, and 2 submarine boats under construction, and on most of these ships a hammer has not been struck for eight or ten months. And you can not point out an instance when any of the ships built in the private shipbuilding yards have been finished within the contract time.

The Maine was to be finished June 1, 1901; now 67 per cent finished. The Missouri was to be finished August 30, 1901; now 60 per cent finished. The Ohio was to be finished June 5, 1901; now about 50 per cent finished. The Illinois was twenty-four months over the contract time; the Indiana, twenty-four; the Iowa, sixteen; the Kearsarge, thirteen; the Kentucky, sixteen; the Massachusetts, twenty-nine; the Oregon, thirty-two; the Wisconsin, seventeen; the Baltimore, fifteen; the Newark, sixteen; the Olympia, twenty-two; the Detroit, fourteen; the Minneapolis, sixteen; the Marblehead, twenty-four; the Montgomery, twenty-two; the Bennington, twenty-four; the Castine, thirty; the Concord, twenty-two; the Machias, fifteen; the Petrel, twenty-four; the Yorktown, fifteen; the Helena, eighteen: the Nashville, nineteen; the Wilmington, sixteen; the Princeton, fifteen; the Davis, nineteen, and the Rowan, twenty-six.

In most every case where penalties have been imposed the penalties have been remitted. Over three millions and a half have been paid by the Government as premiums for excess of speed, but this was done away with some time ago. The building of ships by the Government in the Government navy-yards will give permanent employment, will increase the efficiency of the force, and will greatly reduce the cost of construction as also the cost of repair work. It will give employment to a greater number of men, and the Government will secure better results.

Most of the Government navy-yards are now equipped for construction work; the men employed at the yards are skilled and competent mechanics; the yards are all under the control and management of naval officers.

All work done at the yards is done under the direction and supervision of skilled and eminent naval constructors, and those naval constructors favor the building of ships in Government yards.

The veterans of the civil war, the veterans of the Spanish-American war, the employees of the yards, as well as organized labor throughout the United States, are asking Congress to utilize the Government navy-yards. The arguments, to my mind, are all in favor of the proposition, and I sincerely trust that the bill will be amended so as to make it mandatory on the Secretary of the Navy to have at least three of the ships authorized under this bill built in the Government navy-yards. [Applause.]

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to my friend from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] that he use some of the time belonging to that side.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRIFFITH].

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to demonstrate that some part of this appropriation should be applied toward enforcing our rights upon the shores of Alaska. As a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I desire to call attention to the fact that Canada has encroached upon our lines and is to-day in possession of a strip of country half as large as the State of Indiana, and that whereas our flag from 1867 to 1898 waved over this section of our domain the flag has now been hauled down by the last and present Administration. Canada has moved upon our territory until she has an outlet through the arms of the sea down to the coast.

This contraction of our domain is in strange contrast to the policy of expansion as now advocated by the Republican party.

Whenever our country has been involved with any other power England has always seized the opportunity to assert some claim against us or to encroach upon some of our territory.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that, while we are measuring our "new possessions" and counting the spoils of conquest, it would be prudent in us to measure our undisputed territory and find out the boundaries of our domain. No farmer would try to fence in his neighbor's land until he had secured to himself the title of his own acres. Is not the United States forgetting the fable of the dog that jumped into the water to catch the shadow of the meat in his mouth and lost hold of the substance in the vain pursuit?

Do we own Alaska, the Alaska which we purchased from Russia at a cost of $7,200,000 in 1867? This is a grave question, Mr. Chairman, for the answer to it depends on whether we shall be still fighting the Filipinos after England shall have conquered the Boers. If England shall succeed in her nefarious purpose of exterminating the intrepid burghers of South Africa, or, what is more probable, of cheating them by lying pretenses into a hollow peace, while we are still engaged in the business of making a "howling wilderness" of the Philippine Islands, we may well doubt our dominion over the gold fields of the North, bought and paid for with our good money.

Our miners upon the Yukon and the shores of Bering Sea are crying to us for protection. They are remonstrating against having the British flag unfurled over their homes upon American soil; they are remonstrating against British dragoons destroying ancient landmarks and monuments erected by Russia a century ago; they are remonstrating against British surveyors setting up their theodolites and drawing their sinister angles upon territory which we have held for thirty-five years under a title that has never been challenged, and which Russia had held for forty-two years before ceding the same to us; they are remonstrating against British soldiers, with rifles on their shoulders and caps cocked impudently upon one side, enforcing the laws of England in American camps, far within the American borders; they are remonstrating against the exactions of the British taxgatherer on American soil, an outrage which is aggravated by the tax being four times as great as that levied by the Transvaal Government on the mining Uitlanders, one of the alleged grievances that caused Great Britain to begin the war.

These remonstrances from our fellow-citizens of the Northwest fall upon dull ears. How could it be otherwise? We are busy in the Tropics—too busy to resent insults or aggressions under the Arctic Circle. Will the impudent claims of Great Britain in Alaska be relaxed while the islands in the Asiatic sea demand our attention?

Does the history of England justify the expectation that she will voluntarily abandon any place on earth where her soldiers have once put their feet? The fact that the land belongs to somebody else is of not the slightest consequence to England, except that it increases her avidity in seizing it and her enjoyment in possessing it.

There is no such word as "justice" in her vocabulary; no such sensation as shame in her repertory of emotions. There is no land on earth that conceals wealth or possesses value that is not the object of her covetous desire. If the owner is poor and weak, or if he is otherwise engaged, so that her encroachments will not be resented, or if there be with him "an understanding, an agreement, an alliance, if you wish," England is sure to put in an appearance as the original owner of the property.

As I have said, however, it is not only the poor and weak who are the prey of Great Britain. She also robs strong nations when they are so preoccupied and hampered that they can not successfully resist the plunderer. Not once only or twice, but half a dozen times since the treaty of peace was signed with us in September, 1783, Great Britain has invaded our territory, scorned our pretensions, boldly violated that treaty, and on several occasions successfully deprived us of our own.

Before that treaty the people of all the colonies enjoyed unmolested the right to take fish of every kind off the banks of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and this right was in that treaty guaranteed and confirmed anew; but it has been denied ever since pugnaciously and almost to the point of war.

By the treaty of 1783 it was supposed that we had settled with Great Britain and obtained release from her exactions. But before a score of years had passed she required to be conciliated, held up her platter again and made new demands, and in 1802 we were compelled to pay her $3,000,000 to satisfy alleged claims of alleged individuals who asserted that they were "loyal subjects" and had lost property during the Revolution.

By the treaty of 1783 the northeastern boundary of the United States was drawn from the headwaters of the St. Croix River to the Highlands and along the said Highlands, which became the watershed between the St. Lawrence River and the Atlantic, to the source of the Connecticut River. For more than a generation this was construed literally and the maps made in both England and America ran the boundary line up nearly to the St. Lawrence River, and included much of what is now Canada and New Brunswick.

Presently John Bull cast a greedy eye upon this region and formally insisted that our boundary should be contracted. The demand was resisted. The contention went on for many years till finally, in 1842, when the quarrel had become chronic and was verging upon hostilities, the British minister, Lord Ashburton, and our Secretary of State, Daniel Webster, came to an agreement. The incidents which led up to this agreement are obscure. They both lived on Lafayette square, and were near neighbors. They dined together often. They were generous livers, sometimes too generous.

The net result was that Great Britain was conciliated again. America surrendered 7,500 square miles of land—a territory nearly as large as the State of New Jersey. There was never any justice in this transaction. There was never any claim that it was not within the "Highlands." For sixty years the children of England and the United States had studied geography on maps which included this territory within the United States, and after the surrender was made one of these old maps was found in the British Museum by Lord Brougham, bearing in the handwriting of George III the words, "This belongs to the United States." But England was "conciliated."

By this time our northwestern boundary had become involved. The United States claimed to own Oregon Territory, and this territory was held to extend for 500 miles above Puget Sound, joining the Russian province of Alaska. In the "treaty of amity and limits" concluded and ratified in 1821, Spain had formally quitclaimed to the United States all her rights to this territory. We had sent Lewis and Clarke thither, had established the town of Astoria, and had built forts upon the Columbia. Our vessels had traded upon its coasts as far north as Sitka.

But England, which had never acquired any right to the territory, except such as a few wandering half-breed hunters and fishers could bestow, now demanded again to be "conciliated." It was an auspicious moment. Texas had been admitted into the Union, and General Taylor was sent to the Rio Grande. Just then Packenham appeared upon the scene, bristling with demands. The United States Army was across the Mexican border; this was Great Britain's hour.

The American people raised the wild cry of "Fifty-four forty or fight," 54° 40′ being the southern line of Russian Alaska. But the cry was untimely. We could not fight two nations at once, and Great Britain knew it. She therefore made a peremptory demand and our Secretary of State was compelled to concede it in the name of peace.

For two generations American maps and school atlases had marked as our own this vast territory north of Puget Sound, as large as the present States of Oregon and Washington together; but Packenham persisted in his peremptory requirement that the American flag should be hauled down wherever it was floating over this great empire of the Northwest, accompanied by the implied alternative threat that a brigade of British troops would be landed in Portland.

The American Government made peace. It hauled down its flag wherever it was unfurled north of Vancouver, between the ocean and the Rocky Mountains. This treaty, ratified under the menace of war, transferred to Great Britain the most of that region now known as British Columbia—not less than 160,000 square miles, capable of making 20 states like Massachusetts or 5 as large as the great State of Indiana. Again Great Britain was "conciliated."

Now, at the beginning of the twentieth century, as frequently through the nineteenth, Great Britain again asks to be conciliated—nay, she imperatively and arrogantly demands to be pacified. The party in control of this Government has affirmed that the American flag shall never come down where once it has floated. But as it has already been pulled down where it waved over 7,000 square miles of New Brunswick and 160,000 square miles of British Columbia, we can only interpret the Republican declaration to mean that the Star-Spangled Banner shall never be pulled down excepting where it floats justly and by right.

Is it to be pulled down permanently where it has been set by solemn treaty upon the summits of the Cascade Range in Alaska? Is it to be chased down the slopes of the mountains and driven into the sea by the Canadian mounted police at the behest of Joseph Chamberlain, whose hands are red with the blood of the Boers and who is diverting himself in the attempted destruction of the flags of two brave young Republics in South Africa? It has been said, if not in the Canadian Parliament, openly in the Canadian press, that Great Britain would have to pay for the services of the Canadian regiments in the Transvaal by transferring to them the mining camps of American Alaska. Is this indemnity about to be exacted? Are 10,000 square miles of American territory to be seized by England to compensate for the blunders of Kitchener and the bravery of De Wet, Botha, and Delarey?

"Oh, no," says Great Britain; "we do not at present propose to go to extremities, and drive Americans into the sea in Alaska; we only propose to submit the question to arbitration." It may as well be understood at once, if the fact has escaped the attention of Great Britain till this time, that there are some questions that are not subject to arbitration. If the United States was to claim Ireland as its own would England consent to arbitrate the claim?

If we were to seize Nova Scotia, would England and Canada submit it to arbitration, although more than half the population of Nova Scotia consists of the descendants of Tories who fled from this country during the Revolution? Would England consent to arbitrate a claim of France to the island of Jersey, although that island is within 12 miles of the French coast and more than 100 miles from England? No; possession which has been for generations undisputed is not subject to arbitration.

Let me pass the history of Alaska in quick review, and show that the British claim is equally new and preposterous. The United States and Russia signed a treaty in 1824 in which they agreed on the parallel of 54° 40′ as the division between their respective territories, and in February of the next year Russia and Great Britain signed a treaty which drew the following boundary line between their respective possessions in North America:

ARTICLE III. The line of demarcation between the possessions of the high contracting parties upon the coast of the continent and the islands of America to the northwest shall be drawn in the manner following: Commencing from the southermost point of the island called Prince of Wales Island, which point lies in the parallel of 54° 40 north latitude, and between the one hundred and thirty-first and the one hundred and thirty-third degree of west longitude (Meridian of Greenwich), the said line shall ascend to the north along the channel called Portland Channel as far as the point of the continent where it strikes the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude; from this last-mentioned point the line of demarcation shall follow the summit of the mountains situated parallel to the coast as far as the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude (of the same meridian); and, finally, from the said point of intersection the said meridian line of the one hundred and forty-first degree, in its prolongation as far as the frozen ocean, shall form the limit between the Russian and British possessions on the continent of America to the northwest.

ARTICLE IV. With reference to the line of demarcation laid down in the preceding article, it is understood:

First. That the island called Prince of Wales Island shall belong wholly to Russia.

Second. That wherever the summit of the mountains which extend in a direction parallel to the coast from the fifty-sixth degree of north latitude to the point of intersection of the one hundred and forty-first degree of west longitude shall prove to be at the distance of more than 10 marine leagues from the ocean, the limit between the British possessions and the line of coast which is to belong to Russia, as above mentioned, shall be formed by a line parallel to the windings (sinuosités) of the coast, and which shall never exceed the distance of 10 marine leagues therefrom.

In defining the boundaries of Russian America the Russian Government never failed to insist that it was entitled to a strip of seacoast (lisière, in the language of diplomacy) on the main land from the Portland Channel on the south to Mount St. Elias in the north, so as absolutely to cut off the British possessions from all access to the sea above the point of 54° 40′.

For more than half a century the British Empire never contested this interpretation, and after the cession of Russian America (afterwards called Alaska) to the United States, in 1867, England still quietly accepted the reading of the treaty, which declared that the boundary "shall follow the summit of the mountains parallel with the coast." Map after map was published by Russians, English, Canadians, and Americans, unanimously agreeing in placing the boundary upon the mountain tops, at least 30 miles from shore. They all agreed in shutting off England from all access to the sea at every point north of Portland Canal, even from Lynn Canal, an immense bayou, stretching inland.

When the Russo-British treaty was negotiated in 1825, Sir Charles Bagot, on behalf of England, contended urgently for a free access to the sea as far north as possible. He first proposed that the boundary line should run "through Chatham Strait to the head of Lynn Canal, thence northwest to the one hundred and fortieth degree of longitude west of Greenwich, and thence along that degree of longitude to the Polar Sea." To this proposition Count Nesselrode replied by insisting upon the frontier line defined in the treaty.

Sir Charles Bagot thereupon modified his plea and marked out a boundary wandering among the islands and giving the Hudson Bay Company access to the fiords and estuaries. The Russian plenipotentiaries insisted upon the boundary laid down in the treaty. Russia thus simply defended her territory, while England sought to obtain territory which she had never possessed. It was, as Count Nesselrode said in contrasting the policies of the two nations, "Thus we wish to retain and the English wish to acquire." England, after much discussion and a long and stubborn resistance, finally yielded at every point.

The mutual understanding of both the British and the Russians as to the boundary which they definitely arranged between their respective Empires in the treaty of 1825 is proved, first, by the overwhelming multitude of maps of the best cartographers of the leading nations of the world, including England and Canada, in recognizing the boundary always claimed in the beginning by Russia and afterwards by the United States; second, by the accordant acts of the British and Canadian authorities.

Not only had Great Britain recognized and confirmed in the official maps which she had published the boundary as defined in the treaty, but she had still further confirmed the mutual understanding by renting from Russia for a long term of years the very territory which she contended was her own. Great Britain agreed to pay and did pay from the year 1839 to the year 1857 $7,500 a year for this very margin of coast which she now claims is British territory.

Probably the most important English map, indicating what the best geographers of the British Government thought was the true boundary until very recently, is the British Admiralty Chart, No. 787, giving the northwest corner of America, prepared in 1876 and corrected up to April, 1898.

On this chart of the British Admiralty the frontier of the United States descends the one hundred and forty-first degree of longitude west from Greenwich, and then advancing follows the sinuosities of the coast, so as to give a continuous strip of territory completely cutting off the Dominion of Canada from all contact with the fiords or even estuaries which make their way into the continent. This boundary between British and American territory is drawn more than 50 miles from the coast. Thus the British Admiralty itself upholds and indorses the territorial claims maintained by both the Russian and the United States Governments.

This significant chart, it will be noted, was corrected up to April, 1898. On the 1st of August, 1898, the British Government for the first time presented to the Government of the United States a statement revealing the fact that it repudiated the provisions of the treaty of 1825 concerning the meaning of the Alaskan frontier as defined in the Anglo-Russian treaty, and on August 23, 1898, it claimed that the eastern boundary of Alaska should run across the estuaries and fiords, so as to give Great Britain access to the sea.

It is in exact accordance with British character that this demand was made during the very year that we got into trouble with Spain. As soon as it was obvious that we had a war upon our hands, England hastened to formulate and present demands which had not before occurred to her. As, during the rebellion, she took instant advantage of our plight by launching a privateer to prey upon our commerce, so now, when we were involved in trouble with another nation, she presented a demand for a new boundary that would give her a thousand or more square miles of territory.

It is to be further observed that her cupidity was tempted in still another way. Not only was an accession of territory desired, but the very year before, it had been discovered that that territory hid untold wealth. As poverty proved an ample protection to the South African Republics for scores of years, and as England made no assault upon their integrity until diamonds had been found at Kimberley and abundant gold in the Witwatersrand, so the greedy plunderer made no motion to climb over the mountains and invade Alaska till it had become an Eldorado.

Our Secretary of State is a most amiable and obliging person. His sensibilities were deeply wounded when he heard that the Alaskan miners had held a meeting and resolved to pay their taxes to Great Britain in lead, but not in any more valuable metal. He was also profoundly touched by the complaint of Mr. Chamberlain that the people of British America could not get down to the salt water, and the expression of his hope that the United States would consent to the abrogation of the treaty without insisting on any equivalent.

The Secretary of State is tender hearted. He sympathizes with distress wherever he beholds it, especially in great and powerful empires, and after residing several years in Great Britain he developed a fervent attachment for its style of government, which has broken out in a magnanimous concession almost without parallel in the history of nations.

It is less than three years since his susceptible heart was touched by an appeal from Great Britain for a temporary modification of the Alaskan boundary. The United States was at war, and England requested, in accents suggestive of a demand, that the boundary between her British possessions and the North Pacific should be rubbed out temporarily. She did not offer any reciprocal consideration. She did not take the trouble to define the word "temporarily."

Everybody knows that when Great Britain uses the word "temporarily" in this connection it always means "permanently." Whenever she takes transient possession of any land on the face of the earth, she remains there forever and a day. In the light of these facts must be read the official document printed by the State Department entitled "Modus vivendi between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, fixing a provisional boundary line between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada about the head of Lynn Canal."

Concluded by exchange of notes October 20, 1899, by John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States, and Reginald Tower, chargé d'affaires of Her Britannic Majesty at Washington.

This remarkable document gave to Great Britain, without any equivalent and without any effort to define the word "temporary," the right to occupy thousands of square miles of our territory with her soldiers and surveyors and to harass its American inhabitants, and I give it in full, as follows:

It is hereby agreed between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain that the boundary line between Canada and the Territory of Alaska in the region about the head of Lynn Canal shall be provisionally fixed as follows without prejudice to the claims of either party in the permanent adjustment of the international boundary:

In the region of the Dalton Trail, a line beginning at the peak west of Porcupine Creek, marked on the map No. 10 of the United States Commission, December 31, 1895, and on sheet No. 18 of the British commission, December 31, 1895, with the number 6500; thence running to the Klehini (or Klsheela) River in the direction of the peak noth of that river, marked 5020 on the aforesaid United States map and 5025 on the aforesaid British map; thence following the high or right bank of the said Klehini River to the junction thereof with the Chilkat River, a mile and a half, more or less, north of Klukwan; provided that persons proceeding to or from Porcupine Creek shall be freely permitted to follow the trail between the said creek and the said junction of the rivers into and across the territory on the Canadian side of the temporary line wherever the trail crosses to such side, and, subject to such reasonable regulations for the protection of the revenue as the Canadian government may prescribe, to carry with them over such part or parts of the trail between the said points as may lie on the Canadian side of the temporary line such goods and articles as they desire, without being required to pay any customs duties on such goods and articles; and from said junction to the summit of the peak east of the Chilkat River, marked on the aforesaid map No. 10 of the United States Commission with the number 5410 and on the map No. 17 of the aforesaid British commission with the number 5490.

On the Dyea and Skagway trails, the summits of the Chilcoot and White passes.

"It is understood, as formerly set forth in communications of the Department of State of the United States, that the citizens or subjects of either power found by this arrangement within the temporary jurisdiction of the other shall suffer no diminution of the rights and privileges which they now enjoy.

"The Government of the United States will at once appoint an officer or officers, in conjunction with an officer or officers to be named by the Government of Her Britannic Majesty, to mark the temporary line agreed upon by the erection of posts, stakes, or other appropriate temporary marks."

This is, indeed, a curious example of a modus vivendi. In the Century Dictionary we read that the modus vivendi is "a manner or way of living; a temporary arrangement pending a settlement of matters in debate, as between two nations." Hitherto when nations have established a modus vivendi it has been established by the nation actually in possession, and if it be a question of boundary, and if the boundary has been defined by a treaty, the modus vivendi operates in accordance with the terms of the treaty.

In this case of Alaska, however, the generous and susceptible Secretary of State establishes a modus vivendi in accordance with the claims of the party not in possession and conceding to him territory which he has never had the right to enter.

This is a new kind of modus vivendi, so absolutely novel that it ought to be secured to America by an international patent. Possession has hitherto been said to be nine points of the law; and if a man's right to his house is contested in the courts, he does not usually move out of it until some kind of a verdict has been found against him.

Much less does he invite the contestant to occupy the house jointly with him until some indefinite future year. The impudence of Mr. Reginald Tower in making the proposition finds its counterpart in the unsophisticated simple-mindedness of John Hay in conceding it. Or is it something else than simple-mindedness—perhaps the same lack of patriotism which induces him to permit and protect the establishment of British camps of supply at New Orleans in violation of our neutrality laws as defined by treaty?

I call your attention to the statement of Hon. J. W. Ivey, late collector of customs in Alaska, as published in the Washington Post:

Turning to the dispute over the boundary line, Mr. Ivey continued:

THE BOUNDARY-LINE DISPUTE.

"The United States made a most stupendous blunder when it submitted the boundary question to arbitration. The treaty of 1825 between England and Russia so clearly defines the line that it is not debatable. The Canadians are to-day occupying millions of acres of American territory at Forty Mile, the Porcupine, and other stations in that vicinity. Their surveyors and engineers have been actively at work for years, and I am satisfied that it will be soon proven to the satisfaction of our people that their zeal for their government has led them to destroy boundary monuments erected by the Russian Government more than half a century ago.

"Three years ago, when gold was discovered by American miners on American soil in the Porcupine district, the Canadians aggressively moved forward 21 miles, taking in most of the mines, subjecting the American miner to Canadian laws, executed by armed officers under the British flag while on American soil. Under these conditions Secretary Hay consented to a 'modus vivendi' with the British Government, agreeing to postpone the settlement of the question, leaving the Canadians in possession of the territory. If this was done by our Government through ignorance it was inexcusable; if intentional, it was a crime.

"The Canadians should have been put back to their own line by persuasion, if possible, but by force, if necessary, and action should have been taken before the sun went down.

NO CAUSE FOR ARBITRATION.

"The United States should withdraw this question from arbitration, after which it should make the survey on the lines defined by treaty, erect its boundary monuments, and if that does not settle it, let it be settled the way George Washington settled with them."

The cuckoo warbles its curious note as far north as Alaska, and we must not forget its sinister habit of depositing its eggs in the nests of other birds to be hatched and the unpleasant habit which the usurping strangers have of killing the young of their entertainer and kicking them out of their own mother's nest.

Æsop lived a great while ago, but he has bequeathed to us a prophetic fable: A porcupine, looking for shelter, asked a nest of ground squirrels to admit him into their cave. Being good-natured, they granted him hospitality, and in he came accordingly; but he made such aggressive and ugly use of his sharp quills that they soon repented of their easy compliance and entreated the porcupine to withdraw and leave them their home to themselves. "No," said he, "let them quit the place that don't like it; for my part, I am well enough satisfied as I am, and shall make it my home."

And the porcupine made it his home—"temporarily."

The full meaning of the modus vivendi, as I have given it, can scarcely be understood without reference to a map. Its very worst feature, except the surrender to England of territory to which she has no shadow of right, is its fragmentary and indefinite character. It represents the territory included in a circle of 200 miles around the head of Lynn Canal, the central highway to the Klondike.

Of this 200 miles less than 50 miles are covered by the provisional boundary in any way whatever. The Katschin River trail, the Takhin River trail, the Ferebee River Valley, and the great Chilkoot River route northward are all completely unprotected and are left with the open door. Indeed, the business centers of Skagway and Dyea are left with Canadians to share equally with ourselves if they approach by flanking the White Pass and the summit of the Cascade Range.

By the modus vivendi we concede to English soldiers and English surveyors the right to penetrate to the very heart of Alaska, giving them all advantages and acquiring nothing for ourselves. Acquiring nothing, do I say? O, yes; we have acquired something. We have acquired the permission of England to conquer and desolate the Philippine Archipelago, to turn Samar into a "howling wilderness" and to "kill everything over 10 years of age." If this was a duty which we needed to perform, perhaps the acquiescence of the Empire of Edward VII has not been dearly purchased.

Possibly, however, we might have continued to walk in the pathway of honor without seeking the approval of Great Britain. If England demanded to be bribed, or sought to blackmail us, we might have triumphantly quoted one of John Hay's admirable apothegms, published in his works: "Be not too anxious to gain your next-door neighbor's approval; live your own life, and let him strive to gain yours." And if the crime against the Boers and our course against the Filipinos should be mentioned in one breath, it would be cruel to embarrass Mr. Hay by quoting from his own poems this beautiful apostrophe to Liberty:

For all in vain will timorous ones essay
To set the metes and bounds of liberty,
For freedom is its own eternal law.
It makes its own conditions, and in storm
Or calm, alike, fulfills the unerring will.
For always in thine eyes, O Liberty!
Shines that high light by which the world is saved;
And, though thou slay us, we will trust in thee.

The honorable gentleman has now discarded, as maudlin, this sentiment which he no doubt acquired from association with Abraham Lincoln. In fact, he has repudiated many of the principles of his callow youth. "Jim Bludso" was once his ideal hero—Jim Bludso, the brave and unselfish pilot of the Prairie Belle, who nobly did his duty and "held the nozzle agin the bank" till the passengers were saved.

Now, his ideal Jim Bludso trains a machine gun against an unprotected village or holds a burning torch under the thatch of a Tagal home. John Hay's opinion of little boys seems also to have undergone a change. He shed rhetorical tears when "Little Breeches" got lost, and when the child was found herded with the sheep the poet insisted that angels had protected him. The Tagal infants, "everything over 10," seem to have lost their angel guardians, and "loafing around the throne" in satin knee breeches has risen to a delightful profession.

We have not much to hope for from this Administration. It has discarded and repudiated the Declaration of Independence for the greed of conquest, and it has formed an unholy alliance in giving the British Empire permission and assistance in exterminating the gallant farmers of South Africa. The last Democratic President knew well how to defend the nation's honor, and if for nothing else, he should be honored.

When the British lion, roaming up and down the earth, laid its heavy paw upon little Venezuela and insolently growled, "This is mine," Uncle Sam, in the person of Grover Cleveland, took that voracious animal by the tail and gave it such a mighty twist that its roar of anguish echoed across the Atlantic Ocean. And straightway it took its wounded appendage between its legs and hastened home. When some other man of patriotism and unflinching courage shall stand at the head of our affairs, Alaska will be defended against the robber nation of the world, and our bright flag will be drawn again to the masthead wherever it has a right to fly. [Applause.]

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, there is no measure now before Congress which is of more importance to the people of my State and to the neighboring States of the South than the creation of the National Appalachian Forest Reserve.

In 1899 a movement was inaugurated by the Appalachian Park Association at Asheville, N. C., for the purpose of preserving the Southern Appalachian forests. The necessity that these forests should be preserved in order to prevent the washing of the mountain lands has long been advocated by geologists familiar with the country; but what has commended the subject to the favor of the country is "the increasing violence and destructiveness of the floods during the past few years, and the general recognition of the fact that the continued clearing of these mountain slopes would soon result in the absolute ruin of all the interests of this region and of the adjacent lowlands in the several States."

The agitation of the subject resulted in an appropriation by Congress of $5,000 in the Agricultural appropriation bill for 1901 for the investigation, by the Secretary of Agriculture, of "the Southern Appalachian Mountain region of western North Carolina and adjacent States." This very prompt recognition by Congress of the importance of the project was due chiefly to its strong support by the press of the country, which has done more than all other agencies to awaken the American people to the importance of preserving the remnants of our forests before it is too late, and of educating them to a knowledge of the fact that these forests are for this generation to legitimately use but not to destroy.

In 1901 the Secretary of Agriculture made a short preliminary report on the subject, which was submitted to Congress by President McKinley with his approval, and in December last the Secretary of Agriculture made a most exhaustive and valuable report to President Roosevelt, who commended the subject to Congress in a message in which he said:

Its conclusions point unmistakably, in the judgment of the Secretary and in my own, to the creation of a national forest reserve in certain parts of the Southern States. The facts ascertained and here presented deserve the careful consideration of the Congress; they have already received the full attention of the scientist and the lumberman. They set forth an economic need of prime importance to the welfare of the South, and hence to that of the nation as a whole, and they point to the necessity of protecting, through wise use, a mountain region whose influence flows far beyond its borders with the waters of the rivers to which it gives rise.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL.

The purpose of the bill, stated in the report of the House Committee on Agriculture just filed, is—

To set aside in the Southern Appalacian Mountain region a national reserve for the preservation of the forests of that district, the perpetuation of the timber supply, the development of its farming resources, and the regulation of the water flow in its streams. It authorizes the purchase for the people, by the Secretary of Agriculture, under certain reasonable restrictions, of not more than 4,000,000 acres of land, to be selected in the mountain forest region of Virginia, West Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee. It also authorizes the Secretary to accept and administer donations of land in the same vicinity for the same purposes.

While the purpose of the original advocates of this measure was chiefly to establish a park from considerations of pleasure rather than utility, the movement has been changed to the making of a forest reserve as distinguished from a park. Secretary Wilson says: "The idea of a national park is conservation, not use; that of the forest reserve conservation by use. I have therefore to recommend a forest reserve instead of a park."

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL.

The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase land suitable for a forest reserve in the Appalachian Mountains in the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee, not to exceed in all 4,000,000 acres; to care for, protect, use, and make accessible the same; that he shall advertise in said States for land to be purchased and, as between lands of equal value for the purposes of this act, he shall accept the lowest bids; he may also contract for the purchase of lands exclusive of the timber thereon of specified kinds and sizes, the same to be cut under regulations to be established; also, he may contract for the purchase of lands exclusive of mineral rights therein, and the mineral deposits may be mined under prescribed regulations, which regulations, as well as those for cutting timber, shall be embodied in the contract of purchase.

In purchasing lands the Secretary shall in each State conform to the conditions prescribed in the present or future acts of such States, but no lands shall be condemned against the will of the owner so long as the owner shall protect and perpetuate the forests on such lands, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary for the other forest lands purchased under this act, as far as applicable. The Secretary may also accept gifts of lands for such purposes. He shall take proper steps to protect the United States as to the title to lands, and no payment shall be made therefor except after approval of the Attorney-General.

He shall also make provision for replanting of trees on cleaned lands when necessary for the protection of the soil or the water supply. He shall also make such rules and regulations and establish such service as he may deem necessary for the care, protection, control, and use of such forest, and may sell such wood, timber, and other products as may be removed without injury to the forest, but no sale shall be made except under prescribed regulations, nor at less than the appraised value thereof, the proceeds to be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Two million dollars are appropriated for the purposes of the act, to be available until June 30, 1906, but no part of the money shall be expended for land until a valid title to the same shall be vested in the United States and until the State in which the land lies shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction of the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of any civil process therein. The Secretary shall annually make to Congress a detailed statement of his doings under the act.

DAMAGES BY FLOODS ON THE CATAWBA.

It is a matter beyond dispute and of common observation that in recent years disastrous floods and freshets have visited the above States with alarming frequency. The report of the Secretary shows that the damage to the farmers on the Catawba River alone, caused by the May, 1901, storm, on the Blue Ridge, about the sources of that river, amounted to a million and a half dollars, and that an August storm in the same year added a further loss of a half million more on the low lands of the same river.

I find the following in the March, 1902, number of Forestry and Irrigation:

The characteristics of the Catawba River floods have undergone a sudden and alarming change. In previous years all floods along the river rose slowly. The water stagnated like a mill pond over the bottom lands and, gently receding, left a deep, rich deposit on the already fertile bottoms.

The floods have changed, therefore, from an agency of good to the farmers to one of absolute destruction—a quick, tumultuous rise of waters and a swiftly rushing current that tears up the soil down to the rocks and hard clay and leaves barren wastes. This extraordinary and deplorable change in the characteristics of the flood has followed the laying waste in recent years of thousands of acres of woodland in the western part of the State. * * *

There have been two notable floods in the Catawba River in the past. The first was in 1848 and the second was in 1876. In neither instance was there any damage to farm lands. The water rose slowly and receded gently, leaving the river bottoms richer by a deposit of fertile sediment. There is no Government record of the rainfall during those periods, but Catawba River land owners say that there was as much water in the bottoms during the freshet of 1876 as there was last May.

To show the protection against floods furnished by forests the same publication gives the results of a valuable experiment on 400 acres of land, made in the South Mountains, owned by the State hospital at Morganton, N. C., and from which it gets its water supply by a creek having its source in the above tract. For twenty years no timber has been cut on this tract, there have been no forest fires, and the ground is thickly covered with leaves, mold, and undergrowth.

Near by is another similar stream, but the trees have been cut from about its source and there have been frequent fires. Accurate measurements of the flow of water in May and August, 1901, show that while the first stream had lost only 10 per cent of its volume of water between those months the other had lost 38 per cent in the same time.

DAMAGE ON THE YADKIN AND OTHER RIVERS.

During 1901 the May floods caused destruction along the valleys of the Yadkin, the Kanawha, and the upper tributaries of the Tennessee estimated at the enormous sum of $5,000,000, which, added to the damage during the summer and spring on other streams rising in this section, approximates the appalling total of $10,000,000. These figures are enough to stagger belief, and yet they do not include the damage done in the region about the mountains nor to the rice fields on the seacoast.

While 1901 was a most disastrous year, yet similar losses to a less extent have been occurring for years past, and, as I will hereafter show, it is inevitable that if some such measure as this be not adopted, with each recurring year the damage will be greater and greater, just as in past years there has been a perceptible increase in the number and the destruction of these floods.

DAMAGE ON THE SAVANNAH RIVER RICE FIELDS.

This fact is clearly demonstrated by the conditions existing on the rice fields on the seacoast of South Carolina. Take, for example, the rice plantations on the South Carolina side of the Savannah River, which has its source in these mountains. Formerly they were most productive. The lands were exceedingly valuable. They were all cultivated in the most careful manner and yielded splendid returns. Whoever was so lucky as to own one of them was considered a rich man. What is their condition now? Many of them, including their elaborate and expensive systems of irrigation, have been substantially abandoned, and the remainder generally show a loss at the end of the year instead of a profit.

In the course of less than twenty years there has been a complete revolution from a state of great prosperity to one of utter prostration. What is the cause of all this? None other than freshets, all the time increasing in number and destructive power. In about the year 1887 I visited these plantations after one of these overflows specially for the purpose of seeing their condition and ascertaining whether some remedy could not be applied, and I found that on eight of the most valuable plantations on the river the entire rice crop, just ready for harvesting, had been swept away, not one bushel of rice having been gathered and the fields being as bare as a well-traveled highway.

DAMAGE ON THE SOUTH SANTEE.

Take another river, the south branch of the Santee, into which flow the waters of the Broad, the Saluda, and the Catawba, all of which have their sources in these mountains. The South Santee, like the Savannah, was noted for its splendid rice plantations, cultivated in the most expensive and scientific manner, and yielding annually the most bountiful harvests.

For years past the same process has been going on as on the Savannah, and all from the same cause, until there is now not one plantation under cultivation. During a recent visit there I was told by a planter that during the last season the small area planted by him had been covered by no less than 13 distinct freshets of greater or less force, making it absolutely impossible for him to make a crop.

RICE FIELDS AS SEEN BY WASHINGTON.

More than a century ago these rice plantations, now in ruin, attracted the wonder and admiration of the foremost man of his times, and, withal, a great farmer. In Mrs. Ravenel's Life and Times of William Lowndes is found the following:

When General Washington visited the State in 1791 he crossed in his journey all the large rice rivers from the Waccamaw to the Savannah, and he expressed to Mr. Charles Pinckney, then governor, his admiration of what he saw. "He had no idea that the United States possessed such agricultural improvement as the tide lands showed."

But all the rice fields that charmed the eye of Washington are not in a state of ruin to-day—by no means. It is only those lying on rivers that have their sources in the mountains. On the other rivers, those not reaching to the mountains, the cultivation of rice is as profitable as ever, a freshet never destroying a crop except when combined with an equinoctial gale which forces the salt water in from the ocean. The rule is that, as to rivers having their sources in the mountains, rice planting is substantially abandoned, while, as to the others, it is carried on as successfully as ever.

The conclusion is irresistible that the source of the trouble is the mountains, which are also the source of the waters. And how can one doubt this when we find that the destruction from these floods commences in the very mountains themselves, then invades the valleys lying at their feet, then overflows the rich bottom lands of the Broad, Saluda, Catawba, Wateree, and the Congaree, and lastly, overwhelms the rice fields on the coast, the waters all the time loaded with the best soil of the State, which blocks up our harbors or stains for many miles the ocean, into which it is emptied and wasted? Not only is it plain whence comes the trouble, but it is equally plain that it is of recent origin, because these things did not happen in the days when Washington visited the State, nor for many years afterwards. What has brought about the change?

FOREST DESTRUCTION THE CAUSE.

All the evidence goes to show that the cause is the destruction of our mountain forests, which commenced some twenty years ago, just before the time when destructive freshets became so frequent. The lumberman first cut only the more valuable trees, such as the walnut and cherry; then, as railroads improved the means of transportation, he cut other somewhat less valuable trees, until now everything merchantable is cut, tramroads opening up sections hitherto inaccessible. It is estimated by the Secretary of Agriculture that, at the rate the destruction by cutting and fires is now going on, these mountain forests will be destroyed within the next ten years.

HEAVY RAINFALL.

Two of the most striking features of these Appalachian Mountains are the enormous rainfall and the splendid forests. Careful investigation by the Secretary of Agriculture shows that for a period of ten years the average rainfall in these mountains at various places in South Carolina, western North Carolina, and Georgia was nearly 73 inches.

For the year 1898 it was at Highlands, N. C., 105.24 inches; at Horse Cove, 99.97 inches, and at Flat Rock, 78.39 inches. In May, 1901, in twenty-four hours it was 6.12 inches at Flat Rock, N. C.; 7.25 inches at Marion, N. C., and at 8.3 at Patterson, N. C. There was a rainfall of 8 inches in eleven hours near Roan Mountain. The total rainfall for August, 1901, at Highlands was 30.74 inches, while the annual rainfall in the basin of Broad River is approximately only 51 inches.

Moreover, the rainfall, as a rule, is exceedingly heavy at short periods, and, owing to the steep mountain sides and the absence of lakes and other reservoirs, heavy rainfalls are followed by a rapid rise in the streams, which, when the forests have been cleared or fires have burned off the underbrush and fallen leaves, produce most destructive floods. The Secretary says:

The soil, once denuded of its forests and swept by torrential rains, rapidly loses first its humus, then its rich upper strata, and finally is washed in enormous volume into the streams, to bury such of the fertile lowlands as are not eroded by the floods, to obstruct the rivers, and to fill up the harbors on the coast. More good soil is now washed from these cleared mountain-side fields during a single heavy rain than during centuries under forest cover.

* * * * * * *

In New England and many of the Northern States the numerous lakes and Glacial deposits of sand and gravel, spread out over the hills and valleys, serve as storehouses for the water and help materially to preserve uniformity in the flow of the streams. In this respect they cooperate largely with the forest cover in that region; and, indeed, they would accomplish much in that direction were the forest cover entirely removed.

But in the Southern Appalachian region there are no lakes and no glacial gravels and sands; the forests and the soil are the factors upon which the solution of water storage depends. And that the problem resolves itself largely into one of forest cover, with its undergrowth and humus, is seen by the fact that in the streams of the Piedmont Plain of the South Atlantic States the irregularity in flow, as observed for a number of years, has been almost directly proportional to the extent of forest clearings. Observations and measurements of the Southern Appalachian mountain streams made during the last few years show that the same is true in that region. Hence, here the water problem is a forest problem.

MOUNTAIN FORESTS.

As to the forests of these mountains the House report says:

The oldest, largest, and most varied primeval hard-wood forests of the continent are within its limits. One hundred and thirty-seven species of trees have been examined and described by the Government experts who have visited and surveyed the territory. The list of shrubs and smaller plants is still greater. Northern varieties mingle with Southern; those from the Gulf region with those from New England. It contains a unique natural collection of forest species selected and fostered by soil and climate which if once destroyed can never be replaced. Among these are cherry, walnut, yellow poplar, chestnut, ash, beech, and the magnolia and mulberry.

The Secretary says they—are the heaviest and most beautiful forests of the continent. * * * For economic reasons the preservation of these forests is imperative. Their existence in good condition is essential to the prosperity of the lowlands through which their waters run. Maintained in productive condition they will supply indispensable materials, which must fail without them. * * *

The agricultural resources of the Southern Appalachian region must be protected and preserved. To that end the preservation of the forests is an indispensable condition, which will lead not to the reduction but to the increase of the yield of agricultural products.

PRESERVATION OF OUR WATER POWER.

Up to this point I have considered this measure with reference only to the farming interests—much the most important to us—and which are already feeling most seriously the damage which the bill is intended to stop. But the question of preserving the magnificent water power furnished by the many rivers rising in these mountains is hardly less important. To-day the larger water powers in the South Atlantic States are confined to the rivers which have their sources in the mountains. I give a table, compiled from the Secretary's report, of the estimated available horsepower and that actually in use on the following rivers:

Rivers.	Available.	Actually used.
James	38,290	8,700
Roanoke	41,000	3,500
Yadkin	56,400	1,500
Catawba	57,000	2,000
Broad and Saluda	43,000	18,000
Savannah	75,000	11,500
Chattahoochee	285,000	4,300
Coosa	141,000	3,700

A safe estimate of the available but undeveloped water power on all the rivers and streams, according to Secretary Wilson, is 1,000,000 horsepower. Everyone is familiar with the extraordinary increase in manufacturing that has taken place in the two Carolinas in very recent years, much of it owing to our abundant water power. It is, of course, the cheapest power to be procured, the water flowing without cost day and night, while every ton of coal purchased adds necessarily and materially to expenses.

Heretofore the advantage of water power over steam has not been demonstrated because steam could be generated wherever fuel could be got, and mills could be located at points having advantages in transportation and otherwise. Now, however, steam has lost its advantage because, through improvements in electricity, power can be brought many miles at less cost than coal can be furnished at most points.

The water powers, therefore, in the not far distant future—

Says the report—

may become as valuable as coal mines, and, as the local supply becomes more costly by reason of deeper mining, the water powers will increase in value. This wealth should not be wantonly wasted.

It has been ascertained that in sections comparatively level, but where the forests have been cleared from areas aggregating from 60 to 80 per cent of the land, floods are frequent and excessive, and that some of the smaller streams in seasons of drought almost wholly disappear, and the use of their water power is substantially abandoned, whereas the flow of streams whose sources have not been cleared of forests shows striking uniformity. The important thing is uniformity of flow—in contrast to a rushing torrent after each heavy rain followed by a weak flow. The report proceeds:

This is just what one would expect who has been, during a rainy season, in the heart of a mountain region where the lands have not been cleared nor have forest fires destroyed the humus cover from their surface. The raindrops are battered to pieces and their force broken by the leaves and twigs of the trees, and when their spray reaches the ferns, the grass, and the flowers below, instead of running away down the surface slope, it passes into the spongy humus and thence into the soil and the crevices among the rocks below. As much of this supply as is not subsequently used by the growing plants emerges from the storehouse weeks or months later in numberless springs. The rain must be extremely abundant or long protracted to produce any excessive increase in the flow of the adjacent brooks.

Of course, the damage is not all owing to the destruction of the forests in the mountains. Anyone passing through my State can see the same process in operation on every hillside that has been cleared for cultivation and now abandoned. There is nothing on the lands to hold the water, which, after each rain, rushes into numerous rivulets, then into the swollen creeks, then into the rivers, already overflowing with the torrents that have rushed down the mountains. And it may with much force be said that the preservation of the mountain forests will avail but little unless the cooperation of individual landowners can be procured.

One of the most beneficial results from passing this bill, Mr. Chairman, will be that it will give an object lesson to our people of the benefits of forestry. The late Mr. Morton, formerly Secretary of Agriculture, had printed at the head of every one of his letters the words: "Plant a tree." No better advice could be given. The Department of Agriculture has for years been doing all in its power to induce private owners both to preserve their forests and to renew them by forest tree planting.

"The private forest lands exceed in area those of the States and the United States combined, and their preservation in productive condition, as regards both the timber and water supply, is of vast importance to the nation." The object of the Department is to show that improved ways of handling timber are best for the owners from a pecuniary standpoint, as well as for the forest, and the Secretary, upon application to him, will, after examination of the land if it be from 5 acres up, prepare a plan for the purpose of promoting and increasing its present value and usefulness to its owner and to develop and perpetuate forests upon it; and all without cost to the owner.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that this is a stupendous project, and to many persons a startling one, but I never was better satisfied that it was our duty to act and to act quickly. While great damage has already been done, yet it is as nothing compared to what will soon take place if some remedy be not applied. The experience of other countries teaches us that it must be done at some time, and that if longer delayed it will only entail enormous additional expense. The Senate report says:

As illustrating the necessity for such action as is now proposed, attention may be called to the fact that in every civilized country it has been found absolutely necessary to preserve the forests on mountain slopes, and especially is this true in more southern latitudes. Everywhere it has been found vastly cheaper to preserve existing forests on these mountains than to reforest such regions after the former forests have been once destroyed.

In Italy it was found that destroying the mountain forests had produced excessive floods, and the Government is now restoring them at an estimated cost of $24 per acre. In France the same destruction occurred, and with the same inevitable result, and the restoration of the forests now in progress will, it is estimated, cost no less than $50 per acre. Unfortunately for those countries the remedy was postponed too long, a postponement that will cost Italy $12,000,000 and France no less than $40,000,000.

In our own country the State of New York is now paying a similar penalty. That State years ago sold, or allowed to be sold, the Adirondack forests, and now, realizing that the water supply of her most important river is rapidly failing, she is buying back the same forests at great expense. Fortunate it is for us that we have realized the danger while we are in position to avert it at only the cost of cheap land.

It is estimated that because of the small amount of work necessary to be done by the Government beyond mere protection, the reserve will be self-supporting through a system of timber selling that will improve, instead of destroying, the forests. South Carolina alone can not afford to make this outlay, necessary as it is for the protection of her farmers, but she fully appreciates the necessity for it and has adopted the following resolution favoring this bill:

A resolution favoring the establishment of a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountain region.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), The general assembly of South Carolina hereby expresses its approval of the movement looking to the establishment by the Federal Government of an extensive national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian Mountain region as a wise and beneficent measure, such as many other nations have already adopted, and which this country should adopt before it is too late, looking to the conservation of its forests and the protection of the sources of important streams; and

Whereas the proposal to establish this forest reserve has been approved and urged by the leading scientific societies and forestry associations of this country and by the general press; and

Whereas this general assembly has passed an act granting its consent to the acquisition of lands in northern South Carolina by the Federal Government for incorporation in such a forest reserve, believing the measure to be one of great importance to the people of this State; and

Whereas a bill is now before the Federal Congress providing for the purchase of lands for this purpose:

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State are hereby requested to urge upon Congress the importance of prompt and favorable action in behalf of this measure.

Neither can the other interested States undertake the work. The United States alone can do it, and I am here, in obedience to the action of the legislature of my State, asking that Congress shall pass this bill. All private rights are protected. What will be done will be done in subordination to the laws of the States interested, and even in the mountains themselves agriculture will not be hindered, but improved.

Through the beneficence of Providence these magnificent mountains, having 46 peaks and 41 miles of ridges exceeding 6,000 fee in height, and 288 other peaks and 300 miles of ridges of over 5,000 feet, "the greatest masses of mountains east of the Rockies," and "the highest mountains covered with hard wood in America." have been provided as an unfailing source for the rivers of six great States.

What a wonderful provision! First the bountiful, even wonderful rainfall; then these splendid forests to preserve and store it for the use of man! But the work of man is fast destroying the handiwork of God. Let us at once see to it that this shall stop and that what was intended for the benefit of toiling millions shall not be perverted to their ruin. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON].

[Mr. JOHNSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RHEA].

Mr. RHEA of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I shall avail myself of this opportunity to submit a few remarks upon the past, present, and future policy of the Administration in the Philippine Islands.

Since I have been a member of this House I have been content, for reasons satisfactory to myself and I trust to my constituents, to remain silent and to serve them in the most effective way I could by constant attendance upon the sessions of the House and by voting upon all propositions for what I believed to be for their best interests.

Not only have I endeavored to be constant in my efforts to represent them upon this floor, but wherever their interests were involved I have endeavored to serve them as efficiently as I could, and this without question of political affiliation or condition in life.

I do not know whether I should consider myself fortunate or unfortunate in being in the American Congress at a period when the whole theory of our Government seems to have undergone a sudden and violent change.

Four years ago when I announced my candidacy for Congress we were upon the threshold of a war with Spain for the purpose of freeing the people of Cuba from Spain's inhuman and despotic power.

Since that time strange events have crowded thick and fast upon each other, until the American mind stands appalled at the gravity of the situation.

The sound of Dewey's victorious guns in the harbor of Manila, as reechoed later by Schley's greater victory in the harbor of Santiago, is still fresh in the minds of the American people.

But who can realize the stupendous results and grave responsibilities inherited by the American people from those brilliant victories.

I venture the assertion, that if four years ago some member of this House had announced to the American Congress that the United States Government would occupy the attitude it does to-day with reference to those foreign islands he would have been laughed to scorn and ridicule by every lover of the institutions of his country.

At that time he would indeed have been considered a wild and reckless prophet who should have foretold that a war begun to free the struggling Cubans from the cruel and despotic power of Spain would to-day have been changed into a war of subjugation in the Philippine Islands—a war which for inhuman acts and atrocious conduct has shocked not only the sense of justice, but the moral sense of the civilized world.

Mr. Chairman, the story of what induced our war with Spain is known to every intelligent citizen in the country.

They know this unhappy people had been striving for generations to secure their liberty and independence. They know that Spain's wicked and inhuman policy had devastated the beautiful island of Cuba and made it a "howling wilderness."

They know that the bitter cries of its oppressed and starving people had so stirred the American conscience that there was a universal demand for intervention.

They know that the destruction of our ill-fated battle ship, with so many precious lives, was the crowning act in the long series of tragedies which hastened the declaration of war and the crushing of Spain's power in the island of Cuba.

They know, too, Mr. Chairman, that this great Republic most solemnly declared that it was not to be a war of conquest; that it was not to be a war for territorial aggrandizement; that it was not to be a war of "criminal aggression," but we protested to all the world that our only purpose was to free the Cuban people from the Spanish yoke and give them the blessing of liberty and independence.

The people applauded the action of Congress in voting $50,000,000 for this purpose. It was a short, decisive, and victorious battle.

We had a right to be proud of our Army and proud of our Navy.

We had a right to be grateful to the Philippine people, who, at our request joined with our naval forces in crushing the power of Spain in the Philippine Islands.

We knew that the Filipinos had been fighting for ages to free their native land from the heel of the despot and to secure their independence.

We know now that they were led to believe through our representatives that an alliance with our forces meant their liberty and a government of their own.

They knew it was a war against oppression, for liberty, and the uplifting of humanity, for we ourselves had so declared, and they trusted in the honor and justice of the great American people. How that trust has been so wantonly and shamefully betrayed the whole world knows to-day.

I believe it was the intention of our Government in the beginning to give to the Philippine people their liberty and independence and a government of their own.

The correspondence between our representatives and the Administration can leave no serious doubt that this was the intention.

We defy any candid and truthful man to read this correspondence and then assert that such was not the inevitable conclusion.

The very fact that our own Government did not question or controvert the tenor of that correspondence is conclusive proof of the fact that the Philippine people had a right to expect that the United States would guarantee to them their independence.

We sought their aid and armed and supported them with the munitions of war.

We knew then that liberty and independence was their dearest hope, and that they would fight Americans as quick as Spaniards if subjugation was to be their eternal lot.

Is it possible that we armed these people knowing that later they would turn their arms upon the American flag?

No, Mr. Chairman, such would have been a suicidal policy and unworthy of the patriotism, if not the good sense, of the American people.

The proof is irresistible that we intended, and they believed, that the hour of their deliverance had come.

But in an evil hour the insane desire to become a world power took possession of some of the American people.

The taste of Spanish blood had whetted the appetite for more, and had so poisoned the American system that we started forth upon our inglorious career of greed, cruelty, and despotism.

We had demonstrated the superior skill of our soldiers and sailors, and our splendid battle ships had startled the world with their effective and destructive power.

Now, we should turn them, not against a great and powerful nation, but against a weak and feeble people, who had lately been our allies against Spain; whose burning desire was for independence; whose every act and declaration was a solemn warning that nothing short of liberty would ever be submitted to; that it was independence or extermination.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that for ingratitude, treachery, and cruelty our present war in the Philippines has been surpassed in modern times. What did Spain do in Cuba that we have not done in the Philippine Islands?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, what have we done in the Philippine Islands that Spain did not do in Cuba?

The American conscience revolted at Weyler's reconcentration camps in Cuba, but that same conscience is supposed to be dormant and numbed at our same policy in the Philippine Islands.

We are told that it is treason to criticise the conduct of this cruel and relentless war.

We are told to wait until the work of "benevolent assimilation" has been completed.

Shall we wait until thousands more of our brave American boys shall go down in death and to the grave in trying to subjugate a people who have been taught by the noble example of our forefathers that liberty was the priceless jewel of the human race?

Shall we wait until the torch has finished its deadly work and blackened the earth with the smoke of its humble homes?

Shall we wait until another Smith shall issue his command to "kill and burn and make it a howling wilderness;" until its land is bleached with the bones of its men, women, and children?

Shall we wait until we have exterminated its population "above the age of 10," and left only its babes and sucklings as a reminder of the generosity of the great American people?

Mr. Chairman, those who have disagreed with the Administration in its policy in the Philippine Islands have been accused of encouraging resistance to our authority there.

Let us remember that nearly a century and a half ago, when our forefathers were struggling for liberty and independence against the despotism of Great Britain, the elder Pitt, one of England's greatest statesmen, came to our relief and declared upon the floor of the House of Commons:

> Gentlemen, sir, have been charged with giving birth to the sedition in America. They have spoken their sentiments with freedom against this unhappy act, and freedom has become their crime. Sorry I am to hear the liberty of speech in this house imputed as a crime. But the imputation shall not discourage me. It is a liberty I mean to exercise.
> No gentleman ought to be afraid to exercise it. It is a liberty by which the gentleman who calumniates it might have profited, by which he ought to have profited. He ought to have desisted from his project. The gentleman tells us America is obstinate; America is almost in open rebellion. I rejoice that America has resisted. Three millions of people so dead to all feelings of liberty as voluntarily to submit to be slaves would have been fit instruments to make slaves of the rest.

The cry of treason and the encouragement to the American rebels had no terrors for Pitt. He went so far as to boldly declare that he rejoiced that America had resisted.

I am not aware, Mr. Chairman, that any American Senator or Representative has ever gone so far with reference to the Filipinos. It has only been a source of regret to us that this free Republic should have pursued a course of such manifest injustice and cruelty as to inevitably lead to resistance upon the part of a people whose burning desire was for liberty and to whom the thought of independence was as sweet as it was to the American colonists.

Mr. Chairman, in all the years of our national life, what loyal American has been found to denounce Pitt as a traitor and to condemn him for his courageous defense of our colonial ancestors?

They were resisting what they rightly conceived to be the unrighteous and unconstitutional acts of the British Parliament.

The Filipinos are resisting what they conceive to be an unrighteous military subjugation and the unconstitutional acts of the American Congress and the President of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, we were told in the beginning that our war in the Philippine Islands was in behalf of civilization and Christianity—that it would be of short duration, and with little loss in treasure and blood.

But nearly four years have passed and the bloody tragedy still goes on, and as the years have fled the Army has been enormously augmented; the expenditures are climbing rapidly to the half-billion mark; our military excesses have gone from bad to worse, until the country has been largely depopulated of its adult male citizenship, to say nothing of the women and children who have perished in the awful work of destruction.

Since we have Christianized them with the sword and civilized them with the torch we do not now hear so much about Christianity and civilization.

It is now commercial expansion! We are told that they have once again become pacified and the land is ready for the advent and possession of the carpetbagger and adventurer.

Mr. Chairman, we would hope and trust that they could not only be pacified, but satisfied; but we do not believe that the word "pacified" has any place in the argument of this question. We do not believe that a people high strung and intelligent as they are said to be—a people who love their homes and their country, and who for more than two hundred years have shown their willingness to die for the security of the one and the independence of the other, in their unequal warfare against Spain and other powers—will ever become "pacified" until they have been promised and assured their independence and a government of their own. They may be overpowered and subdued for a while, but will not the insults and wrongs and tortures and devastation which they have suffered at our hands live to rankle in the bosoms of their posterity and call for a continued military force to keep them in subjection?

Now, before proceeding to ascertain what is to be the future course of the Republican party with reference to the Philippine Islands, as revealed by the two bills pending in the Senate and House for the government of said islands, let us see how the account stands to date.

But first let me advert to the proposition so often advanced by our friends upon the other side that the American people had indorsed at the polls the policy of the party in power in the Philippine Islands. I deny it.

I deny that the Republican party ever went before the people upon any fixed and certain policy as to the government of the islands. Their cry was, Stand by the flag; uphold the Army; the country is prosperous; "let well enough alone," and trust to us to deal honorably and justly with the great questions involved in our foreign possessions—and the people, whose blood was still feverish from the excitement of war, took them at their word.

But the people of this country are a just, intelligent, and discriminating people; they are a patient and forbearing people, but when their conscience is once aroused they can not be trifled with.

They know a great deal more about these questions than they did two years ago.

The facts have been slowly but surely coming to light.

The books have been partly opened and we see more clearly the fearful condition to which our country has been brought.

It is true the reserve (I will not say concealment) that has obtained in Administration circles, and the censorship which has been permitted, has kept the light from a great many things that the people would like to know in regard to what has transpired in the Philippines; but we know enough to know that our whole course there has been an expensive and horrible one.

The Secretary of War recently stated in a communication to the Senate that it would be difficult to give in detail all of our expenses in the Philippine Islands up to the present time.

But it is not denied, I believe, from any source that these expenses have exceeded $300,000,000.

And this does not take into account the amount we have paid, are now paying, and the enormous amount we will have to pay for generations yet in pensions to the dependents of those who have or may die from wounds or disease and to those who have and will contract some of the innumerable diseases to which the human race is subject.

I have no doubt it would be a safe prediction to say that 75 per cent of the Americans who are in the service of their country in that tropical climate will finally be placed upon the pension roll.

No one can estimate the untold millions that the American people will yet have to pay for this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, if the millions we have already spent in trying to subjugate the Philippine people had been kept at home and wisely expended what manifold blessings it would have brought to the American people.

We have seen gentlemen upon this floor antagonize certain items in the agricultural appropriation bill, where the question of only a few thousand dollars was involved, and which was intended to aid the great agricultural interests of the country. This great Department of the Government which is doing such a magnificent work for the farmers of the country is to receive niggardly aid at the hands of the American Congress, while millions are leaving the Treasury of the United States in our mad prosecution of a cruel and unrighteous war. We are asked to give only a few thousand dollars to the Agricultural Department to be expended under the direction of its Bureau of Public Road Inquiries for the purpose of making experiments in road building and of giving information and arousing public sentiment as to the great importance of a better system of public roads, and yet we spend millions to establish our reputation as a world power and to oppress a weak and sorrow-stricken people 10,000 miles from our capital.

But we are told that the Government ought not to go into the business of assisting our great rural communities in securing a better system of public roads.

Mr. Chairman, this Government since its foundation has spent hundreds of millions of dollars in improving rivers and harbors to increase our commerce and build up the great cities of the country.

They have given away millions of acres of the public lands of the United States to aid in the construction of the great railroads that traverse our Western territory in order to develop that great section and give to its people better transportation facilities.

We contend that if the Government can engage in such enterprises as I have mentioned, and a number of others that might be enumerated, it is just as legitimate and proper for the Government to extend its aid in perfecting a better system of public roads, so as to furnish our rural communities better transportation for the products of their farms.

Then, again, Mr. Chairman, under the system so wisely begun and so auspiciously being carried on of establishing rural free delivery for the carrying of mail to the home of every farmer and wage-earner in the United States, the roads of this country will eventually become a great network of postal routes over which the United States will have its mail carried to within convenient reach of every citizen of the land.

Now, for the lack of sufficient appropriations, this great and beneficent service of rural free delivery has not progressed with the rapidity we had hoped for or that the rural communities had a right to expect.

I believe it is the greatest institution ever put into operation for the direct benefit of the agricultural and wage-earning classes of the country.

They can feel its benefits quickly and immediately, for it brings them into closer touch with the educational, industrial, and commercial interests of the country.

With its complete establishment, the people of all the land will become in easy communication with each other. Newspapers, magazines, and other educational agencies will daily find their way into the homes of the country boys and girls, upon whom in the future, as in the past, must largely rest the perpetuity of our free institutions.

Mr. Chairman, we want to see this great system expanded more rapidly. I have urged its establishment and rapid extension for my constituents with as much persistency as I could. I do not complain that I have not been able to do more, for I realize that the appropriation has not been sufficient to enable the authorities to press the work more vigorously. If we could have kept but a part of the hundreds of millions this Government has so recklessly expended in our inglorious war of conquest and oppression in the far-away islands of the sea, we could not only have more quickly given to that great army of rural producers and taxpayers better roads and mail facilities, but we would have been better engaged in preserving the honor and traditions of our country.

The Congress appropriates about $5,000,000 for the Agricultural Department of the United States. As I have said before, this Department, presided over as it is by a wise and distinguished Secretary, is doing, through its various branches and agencies, an inestimable service to the American people in general and to the American farmer in particular.

I would not detract from any of our citizenship engaged in any of the avocations of life, but I say the agricultural interests of the country deserve the most generous and liberal treatment at the hands of Congress.

They are a patient, patriotic, and persevering people, and have always constituted largely the foundation upon which the greatness and prosperity of our Republic rests.

For the American farmer the policy of the Republican party results in the burning of the candle at both ends.

They not only take from him an enormous sum in the way of taxes for the purpose of increasing the Army and Navy and of carrying out their imperial policy in the Orient, but by reason of its unjust system of tariff taxation as it regards what the farmer has to buy we have reached the point where he is completely at the mercy of the great monopolies and trusts who a few years ago were demanding protection for their infant industries, but which have now become so overgrown that they are actually selling agricultural implements and other domestic articles manufactured here in America for from 25 to 75 per cent less in foreign countries than they are selling the same article here at home.

In other words, by reason of the injustice of our tax laws they are enabled to pay the freight and other charges upon these goods to foreign countries and then sell them much cheaper there than they do to our own people here in America.

Mr. Chairman, as an illustration of the great injustice which the protected monopolies are enabled to practice upon our own people by reason of the tariff system now in force, I herewith give a list of some of the agricultural implements and other articles manufactured in this country and showing the price at which they are sold in this country and the lesser price at which they are sold in foreign countries:

Articles.	Domestic price.	Foreign price.
Barbed wire, per 100 pounds	$3.00	$2.00
Wire nails, per 100 pounds	2.25	1.85
Plows	14.00	12.60
Horse nails, per pound	.17	.14
Axes, per dozen	8.25	7.20
Cultivators	11.00	8.40
Kettles	1.40	.85
Table knives, per gross	15.00	12.00
Rivets, per 100 pounds	10.00	5.55
Typewriters	100.00	60.00
Sewing machines:
Fine	27.50	20.75
Medium	22.00	17.50
Cheap	18.00	12.00

I do not believe that the American people will much longer submit to a policy which gives the foreign purchaser such a great advantage over our own people in the purchase of such goods of American manufacture.

Mr. Chairman, we are told that under domestic conditions, as well as the policy of conquest and empire upon the seas, the American wage-worker in shop and mine and factory is contented and happy, and yet who has not felt in the recent past the unrest and dissatisfaction that was permeating the wage-working classes of the country? Notwithstanding the efforts that have recently been made to alleviate the situation and adjust the differences between capital and labor, we see inaugurated in Pennsylvania, almost under the shadow of this Capitol, one of the greatest, if not the greatest, strikes in the history of the world. Does this show that labor is satisfied with present conditions? Not at all. If such an unfortunate condition of affairs can exist now, at a time when it is alleged there is unexampled prosperity, what may we expect when periods of depression come?

I believe the conflict between capital and labor is one of the greatest dangers that threatens our Republic, and it is most earnestly to be hoped that some way can be found to adjust these differences upon a basis alike honorable and just to all.

We have discussed the policy of the Administration in the Philippines, its conduct of the war, and the effect of such a policy upon the future of this country.

In addition to the many millions taken from the Treasury and spent in our efforts to subdue those people, we are continuing to spend something like seventy-five millions per annum in the further prosecution of those efforts, and where it will end no human being can tell.

We all know that partly by reason of the prosecution of this war the very bill now under consideration carries many millions more than similar bills did prior to the Spanish-American war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other feature of this question that I want to present to this House and the American people.

It is believed that upon the passage of the majority bill now pending that millions of capital will go from this country to the Philippine Islands for exploitation and investment in its lands, forests, and mines. As a nation we are yet in the morning of the development of the natural resources of our own great country, and that great section from which I come is in the very infancy of its industrial development.

No place in the world offers greater inducement for legitimate investment than that great district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor.

I assert here, without the fear of successful denial, that no similar area upon the face of the earth can present a greater field of varied and natural resources than southwestern Virginia.

Its mountains of coal, embracing the surface of almost entire counties, has scarcely been touched by the hand of industry.

Its iron, lead, marble, barytes, salt, plaster, zinc, and other deposits are there in almost inexhaustible quantities, all of which is yet in the beginning of its development.

Its timber consists of numerous varieties of hard woods, and is of the finest quality; its water power is unexcelled; its agricultural lands are fertile and abundantly productive; its grazing lands are unsurpassed, and produce cattle for export and home consumption that commands the highest price.

Its people are honest, industrious, conservative, law-abiding, hospitable, and patriotic, and would welcome those who would come there with capital and an honest purpose to assist in the development of the vast resources I have described.

But now you propose to pursue a course which will divert millions of American capital from the development of our own resources and for the benefit of our own people, to the exploitation of the lands of a wronged and helpless people on the other side of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, the measures of the Republican party for the government of the Philippine Islands, now pending in the Senate and House, are but another step in the onward march of empire and colonial possessions. They do not provide for any government, except a government of force and a perpetuation and increase in the executive, administrative, and judicial power of the Philippine Commission.

They do not disclose or even intimate what the future policy of the Republican party is to be with reference to the islands. They are framed for present emergencies and are almost entirely devoted to provisions for exploitation, greed, and plunder.

There are about 76,000,000 acres of land in the Philippine Islands and only about 5,000,000 are held by private title.

What a magnificent field for the American adventurer! We have spent years in preparation for this, the next inglorious step in the crushing of a people's hopes and aspirations.

Under our "benevolent" rule its men, women, and children have been starved, its people have been tortured, and the torch has swept its towns and villages from the face of the earth.

And now, after all this reign of terror, our Army is to be kept there to hold in subjection its remaining population while the greedy speculator seeks what else he may devour.

No one to molest him or make him afraid.

The American Republic with its Army stands behind him and in front of him while he roams over its great public domain and takes from the forests and mines their richest treasures.

Mr. Chairman, what a spectacle is presented to the world to-day! England is crushing liberty and independence in the South African Republics, in order that she may possess its lands and rob it of its riches, and we denying liberty and independence to a helpless people in order that we too may become a world power, rob the land of its riches, and take our place beside the despotic empires of the earth.

The people of this country have never yet declared for such a policy, nor do I believe they ever will.

No gentleman upon the other side will confess to the American people that he is in favor of ever permitting these islands to be admitted as States into the Union upon equality among the sisterhood of States. That may be the hidden purpose of some, but they dare not proclaim it.

You do not propose now or hereafter to give them their liberty, but your purpose is to hold these people as subjects, and to rule them with the sword of a tyrant in one hand and the decrees of a dictator in the other.

You will keep on sacrificing the lives of American soldiers and spending millions upon millions of American treasure until the people shall demand that you stop your career of annihilation and spoliation, until they shall demand that you shall give to these people their own government with that protection necessary for its peaceful and successful inauguration.

Then, Mr. Chairman, our soldiers can turn their faces homeward and the drain upon our Treasury can cease.

In this course there is honor and glory for the Republic; in any other there is humiliation and shame.

We can then say to all the earth that we began as a Republic and that we shall continue as a Republic.

We can say that wherever we are forced to go it will be to carry the blessings of liberty, not tyranny; it will be to teach people to love us, not to hate us; it will be to establish republics, not empires, and that no black star representing a colonial despotism shall ever stain the red, white, and blue of the American flag. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. I yield thirty-seven minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYNARD].

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, in common with almost every member of this House, I am keenly interested in that phase of this bill which refers to the question of building battle ships and other war vessels in the Government navy-yards throughout the country. Representing, as I do, a district in which one of these yards is situated, it is but natural that the subject should have claimed a large share of my attention. Among the many important measures which have come before this Congress for consideration, none affect so vitally the majority of my constituents as does the measure now before us.

A country like the United States with unlimited seacoast to defend, with many of our largest and most prosperous cities to protect against the invading fleets of an enemy, with a growing commerce, and with ships that are carrying trade to every port, we must be in a position to defend them wherever attacked. All of these things demand that we shall be a great naval power. The burden and responsibility placed upon us by the late war but accentuates the necessity for an increase of our Navy, and the position which the United States occupies as a great naval power makes it absolutely incumbent upon us to be prepared to measure strength successfully on the seas with the strongest naval forces.

The reasons which appeal to us to increase the Navy must just as strongly appeal to our business judgment to convince us that we should keep the public yards of the country prepared not only to repair vessels but to construct in the shortest time and in the most economical manner the largest fighting craft for which a great naval power may have need in time of war. The policy of nearly all the naval powers of Europe is to increase the strength of their navy, and while they encourage and patronize the private dockyards, they at the same time demonstrate their belief that it is sound policy to keep in the highest efficiency the public dockyards by constructing a portion of the new ships in the Government yards.

I refer particularly to Great Britain, whose fighting machines plow the sea in every quarter of the globe, building, as she has, no less than 89 vessels in Government yards in the last twelve years, while Germany and France each built 60 per cent of their ships in government yards; and Russia proposes, when existing contracts are completed, to build all of her ships, and even little Japan is practically doing this to-day.

The reasons for building at least a portion of our ships in the navy-yards are many; but it seems to me that it will only be necessary to call the attention of this House to a few prominent facts to convince the most prejudiced mind of the fallacy of our present policy of fostering private yards at the expense of the public ones. Owning plants that represent capital invested to the extent of nearly a hundred million dollars, costing annually ten millions to maintain, to do four millions of repair work, seems to me to be a business proposition so ridiculous as to need no other argument.

But, Mr. Chairman, the advocates of the private shipbuilding concerns tell this House that we should build our ships in private yards because we save money. Now, if this be true—but which I by no means admit, and, upon the contrary, most positively deny—it would be far better that we sell or even give away these naval stations to some private trust, with whom we may contract at their own price, getting back as much as possible of the money invested, pay the four millions annually for repair work, and save the ten millions that is required to maintain the public yards.

But let us examine some of the other reasons why it is good public policy to build all or a part of the vessels provided for in this bill in the public yards.

First. The Government owns its own plants, which represent an investment of a hundred million dollars. An equal investment in a private concern would have to pay interest, depreciation, taxes, insurance, and a large force of expert men, as well as a large office force; all of which the Government has without adding one cent to the cost of building the ship.

Second. To the actual cost of building a ship in the private yard is to be added whatever per cent of profit is satisfactory; I suppose not less than 10 per cent, and frequently very much more. While it may not have proved profitable in some instances, and the contracting parties may have sustained a loss, we all know that the business is conducted for a profit; all of which would be saved to the Government building in its own yards.

Third. As long as the yards are to be maintained and repair work done in them, we must have a trained force of men to properly and accurately make the repairs that may be necessary.

To keep this force of skilled men on hand, so that they may be available for such repair work as comes to the yard, the Department is trying to find employment for the men instead of hurrying the repairs and doing only such things as are necessary. The present tendency is to see what repairs can be done and what improvements can be made to the ships with the idea of providing work to keep a trained force together. With a ship building on the docks they can be used either on the ships or, when necessary, on repair work, thus always having on hand a large force that can be used for either purpose, and by doing away with the necessity of extending the work on the part of the Department, and the men will not be afraid of working themselves out of a job.

To keep the cost of repairs down to the lowest point the Government must have the most skilled men, but under the present policy we take the risk of driving those men away from employment in the Government yards because of the uncertainty of the length of their employment. With a certainty of a continuance of their employment the Government yards would command the most skilled and best trained men in the trades; and from this skill, in addition to the other strong reasons given, the cost of repair work in the yards would be very much reduced from what it is under present condition.

The chairman of the committee yesterday urged that one of the strongest reasons for building in private yards is that the Government works eight hours and the private yards nine and ten hours. That is not a good reason; the hours of work in Government employ was fixed by Congress, and now the gentlemen on the other side seek to use it as an argument to crack the head of labor. The mechanic working eight hours will do as much work as the man working ten hours, because the shorter hours better fits him for his work; he will certainly do better work for this and another reason; the best trained and most skillful men will seek employment where the hours are shorter and the pay is best.

It follows as a sure conclusion that the most skillful workman will produce the best job and in the shortest time. A better class of workmen means a better built ship, and a better built ship means a saving to the Government in maintenance and repair. The private yards do get ten hours' work a day out of the men, but the Government gets no advantage out of this fact. The extra two hours are the profit of the shipbuilding company, and it is this profit that is diverted by the present policy from the mechanic to the capitalist.

Admiral Bowles, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair in submitting the advantages of building new work in the Government yards, says: "The fourth advantage in carrying on new work in the Government yards is that it enables the Government to maintain a high standard of workmanship and design, by which contractors can be made to conform to what is necessary under their contract," and the Admiral adds that he considers this a great advantage.

I take it for granted that if the members of this House can be convinced that the work can be done in Government yards as cheaply, as expeditiously, and as efficiently as it can be done by private corporations that there will be practically no opposition to those provisions of the bill now under consideration providing for such work to be undertaken by Government labor. And this is undoubtedly true. No one, it is thought, will attempt to deny that private shipbuilders have made large, even enormous, profits out of Government contracts.

If this were not so, they would not be so anxious to secure them, nor would they be so interested in the attempt to defeat any legislation which has for its object the taking of this work out of their hands. Certainly it is true that the U. S. S. Monadnock was built by the Government for less than her sister ship, the Monterey, was built for by an outside corporation. That the Mare Island Navy-Yard repaired the transport Logan for 35 per cent less than the contractors bid to do the work for is a matter of official record, and if such an enormous saving can be made in one instance, there is no good and sufficient reason why it can not be done in all.

It has been repeatedly asserted that when the present stone dock at Mare Island Navy-Yard was completed the Government gave the contract to construct the caisson to a private firm for $78,000. A few years later a new caisson was needed, and the work of building it was given to the Government mechanics, who built it for so low a price that the chairman of the Naval Committee admitted in his argument yesterday that the Government saved $13,000—thirteen thousand as admitted by the gentleman from Illinois or forty-one thousand as claimed by the much-abused cards. The fact, which is the only important thing sought to be shown, is clearly established that the Government, under its own officers, with its own men, saved money over the same work done by contract. The gentleman from Illinois has proved the contention of the card. Further comment is unnecessary.

Many of those who are opposed to the employment of Government labor on this class of work have cited the cases of the Texas, Cincinnati, Raleigh, and Maine, the cost of construction of which vessels they assert exceeded the sum for which they could have been built by the contractors. But it is a well-known fact that no cantractors would undertake the work for the estimates made by the Government. The building of these ships was at that time an experiment, and the navy-yards were not then in a condition to do the work as economically as at present; and many things that were charged to these vessels should have been charged to the betterment of the yards, such as tools, slips, etc., which were not consumed in their building and are still in use at the two yards in which these vessels were built—so Chief Constructor Bowles testified in his hearing before the Naval Committee two years ago.

Their organization was poor; they had no trained foreman to direct the work, no skilled force of mechanics to execute it. The men had to be trained to a new style of shipbuilding. We were changing from a navy of wooden ships to a navy of ironclads. Even the officers of the Navy in charge were themselves inexperienced in building iron ships. From that time on the progress has been steady, and the mechanics now employed, or ready to be employed, in the Government yards are not to be excelled by any in the country.

The men are thoroughly capable and efficient, the method of supervision can not be improved upon, and the yards can at slight cost be fitted with every device needed or desirable in order to place them in thorough condition to build any vessel the Government may construct, even to the largest and costliest battle ship. It may be confidently asserted that to-day our Government yards are in a position to build our ships at no additional cost to the country and to the taxpayers than it would be to have them built for if the work was intrusted to private corporations.

A prominent member of this House, and a deep student of the subject, stated some time ago in a communication which has since been published that "we owe it to the taxpayers to build where it can be done at the least possible expense;" and, in stating the case thus, I am persuaded that he expressed the sentiments and wishes of nine-tenths of the voters throughout the country. Rear-Admiral Melville, the Chief of the Bureau of Engineering of the Navy Department, in a report made in 1892 stated in regard to the construction of the machinery of the Raleigh and Cincinnati as follows:

> It is gratifying to the Bureau to be able to report in regard to the building of the machinery of these two vessels that, judging from the expenditures thus far, its cost when fully completed and erected on board the vessels will be considerably less than the original estimates on which the contractors refused to bid as being too low for the amount of work required, and this after making due allowance for the cost of repairing the machinery of the Cincinnati damaged by fire.

Such testimony from such a source is significant, and should not be forgotten.

Then, too, it is important to remember the testimony of another expert on this subject. I refer to the evidence of the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy, recently expressed before the House Committee on Naval Affairs, who gave it as his opinion that, owing to the marked improvement effected during the last ten years in the administration of navy-yard affairs, the Government could secure better ships for less money by patronizing its own plants.

It has been estimated that the United States has up to the present time spent nearly $100,000,000 in the equipment of its navy-yards, and practically the only use to which they are now put is to keep its vessels in repair. What an enormous investment and what a pitifully small return! As already stated, statistics show that it costs over $10,000,000 annually to run our navy-yards to enable them to do about $4,000,000 worth of repair work.

What a state of affairs! What business man of ordinary intelligence could permit such conditions to continue? It is a wanton waste of public money for which there is no excuse. It is well to remember that the cost of maintaining our navy-yards would be practically no greater if $10,000,000 worth of new construction work, in addition to the repair work, were done than it is to have only a small amount of repair work done there. During the last ten years 4 ships only have been built at the navy-yards at a cost of $7,200,000, while during the same period 139 ships have been constructed in private yards at a cost of over one hundred and thirty-one millions.

With a view to obtaining precise and reliable information as to what amount of expenditure would be necessary to put the Government yards in fit and proper condition to successfully build even the largest battle ships, I requested advices on the subject from the Navy Department, and quote herewith from their official reply:

While improvements are now in progress which will bring the Boston, League Island, and Puget Sound navy-yards to a state of efficiency, there are necessary certain preparations in the way of building slips, slip traveling cranes, railroad tracks, and power communications which must be made before even the important yards could build a battle ship. To be precise: The New York Navy-Yard would be in proper condition to build a battle ship or cruiser provided a simultaneous appropriation is made amounting to $175,000 for preparation of the building slip with overhead traveling crane and power communications. At the Norfolk Navy-Yard it is possible to launch a battle ship or armored cruiser, and the yard is in proper condition to undertake the building of such vessels provided a simultaneous appropriation is made of $225,000 for the building of a new slip, with overhead cranes and power communications. The preceding answer applies to the Mare Island Navy-Yard. At the Boston Navy-Yard the improvements now proceeding in the plant at that yard will bring it into proper condition to undertake the building of a battle ship or cruiser within about two years.

A further communication from the Navy Department is here given:

Referring to the Bureau's letter No. 575-A, 105 and 92 of this date, with regard to the Government navy-yards which are in a condition to undertake the building of a battle ship or armored cruiser, it is noted that particular mention of the navy-yard, Portsmouth, N. H., was accidentally omitted, and it is desired to add that with an appropriation of $175,000 for the preparation of the building slip, now available, with overhead traveling crane and power communications, the building of a battle ship or armored cruiser could be undertaken at that yard.

Thus it will be seen that the Government yards could, at comparatively slight expense, be put in position to undertake the building of war vessels; and it would only seem sound and reasonable business policy to do this, for reasons already stated, instead of having the country's ships constructed by outside parties, who are certainly in the business to make money. But, rather than utilize its own facilities, the governmental policy has heretofore been to keep her costly yards in comparative idleness and use them only for occasional repair work and pay exorbitant sums of money for the construction of new ships by those whose only desire in obtaining the contract is to make as much out of them as possible.

And right here, Mr. Chairman, let me say with the strongest emphasis that this is no attack upon the private shipyard. I for one believe that the private yard is an enterprise that should be fostered. I believe that they should have a share of the Government work. There is in the district which I have the honor to represent upon this floor one of the finest shipbuilding plants in the world; and I would not raise my voice to injure an enterprise in the success of which so many of my constituents are interested.

Foster the private yards, but not at the expense of the public ones. There should be work enough for all. The private yards of the country have now 60 vessels building; the Government yards are comparatively idle. In time of need we should be able to use either or both. Give these four provided for in this bill to the public yards.

Mr. Chairman, in the limited time allotted to me I can not enumerate a great many other reasons which I believe would appeal to this House, why the building of Government vessels in the public yards would be an advantage, both as to the construction of new work and at the same time facilitate and cheapen the cost of repair work which it is the present policy of the Government to have done in the public yards.

The necessity for the United States being a strong naval power and for the continued increase of the Navy is evident; and if this is to be done, we should certainly not any longer remain at the mercy of the private contractor, but should with the least possible delay equip the public yards of the country for doing new work under the most favorable conditions. We have shown that it is a sound policy pursued by all the naval powers of the world; that it cheapens construction and guarantees a better built ship; it provides a permanent force of trained and skilled men prepared at all times to quickly and cheaply do any class of work the navy-yards may be called upon to perform; that it establishes a basis and a standard to which contractors can be made to conform in the execution of such work as may be undertaken by them.

And apart from the considerations already touched upon, which it is thought are amply sufficient in themselves to cause this desirable change to be made, apart from the enormous saving of public money which this policy would effect, it is submitted that even were the cost entailed by the Government constructing its own vessels the same or even greater than to have them built by private corporations still it would be undoubtedly advantageous to adopt the former method for the two-fold reason that this great country, with its continually expanding territory, should be in a position at any moment to turn out powerful fighting machines under its own auspices in case of war, and secondly, that the money spent in the Government yards goes directly into the pockets of the people and not to swell the dividends of the stockholders and capitalists.

Mr. Chairman, the building of battle ships in Government yards is good policy. The people demand it. Labor has petitioned for it. We represent the people, and are here to carry out their wishes. Let us give them what they want. [Loud applause.]

On motion of Mr. MEYER of Louisiana, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. SHERMAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CUBAN DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SERVICE.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report. I ask to have the statement read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, calls up a conference report, requesting that the statement be read and that the reading of the report be omitted. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if this report is concurred in by the minority members of the committee?

Mr. HITT. This report is unanimous, and, more than that, it is that for which the House strove in conference.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennesse. Is it signed by the minority members?

Mr. HITT. All of them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will read the statement.

The report of the conference committee is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13996) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service in the Republic of Cuba, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2 and 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

ROBERT R. HITT,
HUGH A. DINSMORE,
ROBERT ADAMS, JR.,
Managers on the part of the House.

S. M. CULLOM,
JOHN T. MORGAN,
H. C. LODGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the managers on the part of the House was read, as follows:

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13996) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service in the Republic of Cuba, submit the following written statement in explanation of the accompanying report, namely:

On amendment No. 1, increasing the salary of the minister to Cuba from $10,000 to $12,000, as proposed by the Senate, the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2, providing for rent of a proper legation residence and offices not to exceed $2,000, as proposed by the Senate, the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 3, providing for a consul at Matanzas at $2,500, as proposed by the Senate, the Senate recedes; so that the bill remains unchanged except in the increase of the salary of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Cuba, which is made $12,000 instead of $10,000.

ROBERT R. HITT,
ROBT. ADAMS, JR.,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. DALZELL (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

Mr. BATE. Very well, then, I withdraw the request for the reading.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BERRY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KEARNS], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. QUARLES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 4, nays 51; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13359) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. PROCTOR, to insert at the end of line 2, on page 6, the following:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this act shall be used for constructing or procuring disappearing carriages, emplacements, or magazines therefor.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator from California to yield to me that I may submit a conference report.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield for that purpose.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I submit a conference report on the omnibus claims bill, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, having met, after a conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 2, and agree to the same.

That the committee report a disagreement to the Senate amendment numbered 1.

F. E. WARREN,
WILLIAM E. MASON,
H. M. TELLER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

THAD. M. MAHON,
HENRY R. GIBSON,
T. W. SIMS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the effect of the conference report? I should like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. WARREN. For the information of the Senator from Missouri I will say that the amendments made by the Senate to the House bill were two. One of them was virtually to strike out the entire bill and to insert new and old matter together as a substitute, so that amendment numbered 1 really covers all the items that the Senate proposed in the bill.

Amendment numbered 2 related to the title only. The title of the bill when it came to us was, "A bill for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act," and nothing else. We amended it by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The real disagreement is not as to all the items in amendment numbered 1, but is because of the fact that the House conferees received instructions from the House not to agree to certain claims called the Selfridge board claims. As a matter of fact, I will say, for the information of Senators, that the conferees are practically agreed upon all matters except as to one State claim, the differences as to which do not appear to me to be formidable. And as to the so-called Selfridge board claims I think I may say, without divulging any confidences which I ought not to, that two of the House conferees have felt that the Selfridge board claims should be paid in full, and the third one, although not favoring those claims, has suggested on one or two occasions that they should be cut down to the same percentage of the total claims that similar claims were cut down to—and about as many and for nearly as large an amount in Selfridge board claims—as were allowed in the omnibus claims bill last passed; in other words, in the last omnibus claims bill there was a cut of 20 per cent off from all the so-called Selfridge board claims, and I think the same percentage from a large number of the largest of the so-called Bowman claims.

I will refer to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and ask him if I am not correct in that statement?

Mr. TELLER. I understand that is precisely the situation, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. The conferees on the part of the House, feeling bound by their instructions, have desired to report their disagreement in order that they may further test the sense of the House upon the matters contained in this bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the last remark of the Senator from Wyoming discloses the real situation. I suppose what will happen in the other branch will be a motion to recede from the so-called Selfridge board awards. If the House does not recede from its position and insists upon the attitude taken when it instructed its conferees, the matter will then go into another conference, and when reported here, although in the present form as one amendment, I suppose the Senator expects and realizes that opportunity will be presented to move that the Senate recede from its attitude with reference to the Selfridge claims, in order that the whole bill may not be put in peril by reason of those claims. I do not interpose it now, but I myself feel that whenever it next comes before this body the attitude of the Senate may as well be taken upon these claims, in addition to the attitude that the House has taken. I should not want to see the bill fail, because it has very valuable matter upon it aside from the award of the Selfridge board, and clearly, unless the House recedes, that question will have to be, at no far distant date, presented to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I ought to say, after the remarks by the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], that there is a little more to the situation as we get it unofficially from the cloakrooms and from members of the House. That is, that there is a serious—I think I may say very serious—resistance on the part of a great many members of the House to another class of claims in that measure—yes, two others, the Bowman claims and spoliation claims—and such members have felt that as these two classes of claims have passed through the Court of Claims, and that court had cut them down and made findings, they could perhaps afford to put behind them each one his own opinion that such claims were perhaps unworthy and should not be paid, if in doing that they could wipe out and do away with certain other claims that had been long before Congress and which also were findings of official boards of United States officers.

Mr. President, I want to say just one word in regard to the Selfridge board claims, because I have heard or overheard Senators, or at least one or two Senators, in private conversation say that they were rotten, that they ought not to be paid, etc. Of course this has not been publicly stated upon the floor, or I would probably have resented and replied to it. The history of the Selfridge board claims, briefly told, is simply this: A certain class of men who were then engaged in shipbuilding and machine building were approached in the time of the great civil war, when this country was in dire peril, and were asked to build certain vessels upon plans which were not yet completed.

The larger ones of those institutions were approached first with these half and less than half matured plans, and were asked to make bids upon them on grounds approximately as follows: "We want this boat built, and it will not cost more than, say, the Paul Jones. That was, say, $80,000. You must bid $80,000. We will complete these plans and we will see you through." In one case it was represented that the machinery should weigh a certain amount, and consequently cost a certain number of dollars, when, as a matter of fact, after the vessel was finally built and the machinery completed, according to later plans, it weighed several times as much and cost immensely more than the boat referred to.

The Government having taken that position with regard to the contracts, these parties were forced to do the work—and I say "forced," because we have the record showing that the Government, with its strong hand, approached the shipowners and said, "Either you will take this price and enter into contract to build these ships or the Government will take possession of your works and build them." With such shipowners or machine builders discretion was the better part of valor, and they entered into the contracts practically under duress. The plans were not complete. They were changed from time to time. Some of them were changed before the keel of the vessel was laid. The first vessel built under the first plan went down a mile from shore because the plans for the vessel were of such a nature that the carrying of them out produced a structure that would not float. There was delay for from a few months in some cases to years in other cases, nor did they ever have plans complete. The evidence shows that these men asked, yes pleaded again and again, for completed plans. The Department had to wait for ideas for plans until certain experiments had been carried out, or until certain vessels had been floated, or until they had been put into the water to see if they would float.

Now, having built these vessels, the price of material having risen in some cases 100 per cent, and labor the same—we all remember the rapid inflation of prices during that period—the builders came to the Department and asked for pay, upon the basis of what these vessels had actually cost—nothing more and nothing less. The accounting officers of the Treasury and of the Navy departments who were to pay these accounts were bound, of course, so far as they were concerned, under their bonds, by the text of each contract as it read, and could not afford the necessary relief. Hence there was an equity that must be in some way settled. Congress evaded it for a time, as it evades all claims, and has done from time immemorial. Finally there was a request, too strong to be longer denied, for some tribunal. The Government itself selected its own tribunal, judge and jury. That tribunal (the Selfridge board, made up of distinguished officers) made these findings—so many dollars extra cost for this builder, on this ship, or on its fittings of engines and machinery, and so many dollars extra cost for the other. And that finding has remained a matter of record all these years.

The Senate and House have repeatedly had these claims under consideration. They have paid many of them in separate and individual bills and in omnibus bills. I think more than half of them, or about half of them, have been paid, and some of them have been sent to the Court of Claims, and in each instance, so far as I know, the finding of the Court of Claims has been for more money than was allowed under the Government board findings. Now has come the time when your committee, after digging through these claims day after day, night after night, and month after month, have concluded that there ought to be an end and a final settlement; that there ought to be a cleaning up of what is left, and in one bill, to avoid wasting further time of the Senate and House over the individual amounts. It is not fair to those who have not been paid that their neighbors should have been paid, since the claims are all on the same footing, all alike, on all fours together. It is not fair that this money which is due them should remain longer unpaid. In fact, the main opposition in the House to-day is that the claims are thirty or forty years old. But the claimants have never lagged and are not guilty of laches. Congress has been too busy some sessions and too parsimonious in some others to do its duty by these claimants. But yet several Congresses have passed bills in relief, and about one-half have been passed, as I have already stated.

Here we are, Mr. President, confronted with the findings of our own officers, our own courts, and the acts of former Congresses. Will we pay the balance of these claims, or will we say that they are rotten, and that the members of the Claims Committee are corrupt, because there has been an outrageous attack, through a nondescript falsification publication, secretly circulated in the House at the last moment, signed by a man who has been repudiated by the House and the Government on account of his bad habits and morals, and lying, and vicious "cussedness?" Are we going to allow ourselves to say that we will recede from these claims because he says they are rotten? I take it not. But on the other hand, Mr. President, it is always within the purview of a conference committee to cut out acknowledged good items and measures if it becomes necessary. I find there are men in the House who know all about these claims who feel that they would rather see the whole bill fail than have these claims cut out. I find there are others who feel that if this class of claims goes out certain other classes should go out as well.

So I think it would be unsafe at this time and now for the Senate to move to recede from any one of the claims which we have in the bill, although—and I agree with the Senator from Maine—that time may come; I do not think the time has yet arrived.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I did not, in what I said, mean in any way to enter into the merits of the award of the Selfridge board.

Mr. WARREN. I understood that.

Mr. HALE. I was only calling attention to the fact that we may be again confronted with the action of the House voting squarely, as it has done twice, against these claims and insisting upon its attitude. However good they may be, I do not think the Senate could long continue the controversy, when there are so many other items in the bill. All I intended was to call the attention of the Senate to that fact. The House, I suppose, will to-day consider the subject and take its attitude. If it recedes, that ends the whole matter most happily. If, on the other hand, it maintains the position it has already taken in two votes, the Senate being the moving party in putting these claims on, sooner or later, as I have said, we shall be met with a motion to recede. I think the Senator is right in not making it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the conference report?

The conference report was agreed to.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13359) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 2, after the word "dollars," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this act shall be used for constructing or procuring disappearing carriages, emplacements or magazines therefor.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] if he does not think it would be unwise to expend more money on the manufacture of these carriages, which have already cost so many millions and will cost many millions more if this scheme is carried out, until there has been a full, perfect test under service conditions?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, when the amendment was offered yesterday by my friend from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], I should have then stated that the committee had considered this matter during the past few years and were willing at any time, and anxious, to refer it to a competent board to again pass upon this whole question.

The amount involved yesterday was a very small sum, not one-half what has been estimated for by the Secretary of War, and is in the Book of Estimates. I did not make that statement at the time because at the proper time I trusted and hoped that the Senator would withdraw his amendment and either offer one in the line I have suggested or permit your committee to present one which expressed their view.

That which I did object to on behalf of your committee is that Congress has not proved to be a success as experts in building gun carriages, in manufacturing guns, or in passing upon the qualities of high-explosive powder. The Senate is competent, if it had the time, or individual members of it perhaps are, but we have not the time to give it the consideration that those who have made a special study of the subject bestow upon it.

This morning I am in receipt of a letter from the Secretary of War relative to the subject-matter to which the Senator from Vermont refers. If he will withdraw his amendment offered yesterday and present an amendment which he has formulated, I think I will be justified, after having the letter read which has been sent me by the Secretary of War, in accepting the same, if there be no objection on the part of my associates upon the committee.

Mr. PROCTOR. I therefore offer a modification of my amendment, the first part of it being precisely the same and providing for a test.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont modifies his amendment. As modified it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this bill shall be expended for disappearing carriages or emplacements or magazines therefor until a thorough test has been made by a disinterested board of officers of high rank and at least one mechanical engineer of high standing, with not less than 30 shots from a 10-inch gun, with full charges of smokeless powder and full weight of shot, under all the conditions of actual service, the whole time elapsing between the firing of the first shot and the firing of the last shot being reported, and also the time elapsing between the firing of each shot in succession, the cost of such test to be paid out of this appropriation.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of War be read in connection with this proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield for that purpose?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly. I was merely about to say that I drew this amendment and submitted it to the Secretary of War last night, and had a note from him saying that it is satisfactory to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, May 15, 1902.

MY DEAR SENATOR PERKINS: I have just received from Senator PROCTOR the inclosed draft of an amendment which he proposes to offer to the fortifications bill, and providing for a thorough test of disappearing carriages, and he asks me to communicate to you my views regarding it. I think the amendment is a very proper one, and I should be very glad to have it adopted. My view regarding the disappearing gun carriages has been that they were adopted after very full consideration, both by the Ordnance Department and by the Board of Ordnance and Fortification, under the direction of officers of the highest rank and authority, such as General Schofield and General Abbott, and there has never been in my mind any sufficient ground established for reversing the conclusions reached by those officers. The raising of the question, however, makes it very proper, and I think it is very desirable that no pains should be spared to test the question, in every way possible, whether the established policy of the Government in regard to these carriages should be reversed.

Very sincerely, yours,

ELIHU ROOT.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS, United States Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I think the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] is a very proper one, and I am very glad it has the approval of the Department. I myself gave a good deal of attention to this question of disappearing gun carriages some years ago, and I confess to have had some prejudice against the present Buffington-Crozier carriage. I have not believed and do not now believe that it is yet such a carriage as we ought to have, but it is undoubtedly the best carriage now in existence. A better one, in my judgment, can be arranged. There are some defects in it to which the attention of the Department has been called from time to time, but the policy of the Department has been for many years to receive no suggestions from outside people.

The Senator from Vermont spoke of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification. I had something to do with the creation of that board, as did some other Senators who are here, for the purpose of getting into the Department a board that would accept from the best engineers of the country suggestions on questions of this kind. I am sorry to say I think the way that board has been constituted most of the time it was not any great improvement on the former conditions. This trial, I think, ought to show that there are some defects which can be obviated in the present carriage. I know they have been pointed out by some very able engineers. I think perhaps the carriage can be made to be a very valuable one for some places, but only for some places. The idea that it shall be put everywhere is simply absurd, but there are places where a disappearing carriage is almost a necessity.

Mr. COCKRELL. On low land.

Mr. TELLER. The Department, I understand, is going upon the theory that they are not to be put up in every place, because they are a rather expensive machine. There are places where I believe a much cheaper carriage would be very much more valuable than the disappearing carriage. Then there are other places again where it is almost a necessity that we shall have some kind of a disappearing carriage.

So I shall be very glad myself to vote for this compromise, hoping that the trial, which seems to be a proper one, will bring about what we all desire, the securing of the best gun mount there is.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I agree with the general proposition of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. I do not believe the Senator from Colorado would wish to be understood as saying that the Department has refused to entertain propositions of investigation into gun carriages other than the Buffington-Crozier.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I am not talking about the present board as now constituted, but the board of some years ago. It was utterly useless for anybody who was not an Army officer within the circle of their acquaintance to go and suggest anything in the line of gun carriage or almost anything else. As now constituted, I know nothing about it. I have not given any attention to it for a number of years.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, without taking issue with the Senator, because he and I can not differ upon that point, he will remember that we have done something along the line of investigation in disappearing gun carriages. It has not been entirely along the line of the Buffington-Crozier, because we have in this bill that is now before us a settlement proposed with another company which had been employed by the Government to construct a type of disappearing carriage.

Representatives of that contractor were before the subcommittee and stated very frankly that they had failed to bring out as good a carriage as they expected, and furthermore that the Buffington-Crozier carriage was a much better one, and therefore they desired to settle with the Government without further perfecting their type of gun carriage.

Further than that, we have appropriated quite lately some $180,000 altogether for an outside inventor to use in inventing and constructing a type of disappearing carriage. There are some fifty-odd thousand dollars standing now to the credit of that inventor, or that carriage, so that we have not had a change of heart upon the desirability of disappearing carriages.

Mr. President, it may be useless for me to prolong my remarks, since I have no objection to the amendment as proposed, but I do feel that since the subject was brought up in the manner it was and the record made up as it is, there are some facts which I ought to put in the record.

The amendment as first proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] was an attempt to take away arbitrarily from the Secretary of War, an officer in whom we have the utmost confidence as to ability, fidelity, and honesty of purpose, all discretion, and it was to take power away from our Army boards; to leave our engineers, our artillerymen, and our ordnance officers all bound hand and foot as to the construction of gun carriages. The amendment as now proposed opens it to an investigation which is of course proper and to which no one objects.

But, Mr. President, yesterday a record was attempted to be made by the Senator from Vermont that the present Chief of Ordnance was the patentee of the gun carriage in use; that he had sold to a company the rights to the patent for foreign countries. The intimation is clear, in reading the statement as made, that the Senator means to charge that this would probably unduly influence the Ordnance Department; and following the inference further, the suspicion would arise that the Senator intimated that an inferior carriage might be accepted because of personal interest.

Mr. President, I fail to see where any special personal interest arises. The patent, when it was issued, was free for the use of the United States and it is so stated in the patent itself. There is not a possible benefit that can come to either General Buffington or General Crozier by the use of that carriage in the United States. There is no incentive, in my judgment, for the Board of Ordnance to feel that they have any interest whatever in that particular carriage, except the loyal one of best serving the interests of the United States.

What is the history? The history is not that Messrs. Buffington and Crozier first applied for a patent and then came before the United States to sell it, or that they started in for the securement of a patent to make money out of for themselves. Congress created the Endicott board to take up the whole matter of our fortifications and coast defenses. Almost the first expression of that board was regarding the necessity of having some kind of a disappearing carriage.

The War Department was appealed to and sent men abroad to examine all the disappearing carriages in use abroad as well as at home. It happened to fall to Captain Crozier to be selected one of those upon whom was charged the responsibility of finding a good disappearing carriage, if any existed, and if not, to develop one. After looking the entire field over he came to the conclusion that none was up to the desired standard, but he discovered, however, that a patent had been issued to General Buffington a long time ago. He appealed to General Buffington to go on and complete and improve his patent, asking for a further patent, if he desired, General Crozier still not desiring to enter the field himself.

General Buffington refused to have anything to do with the further study of perfecting it. Captain Crozier started to work along other lines to see what other carriage, if any, would do, but his final conclusion was that, taking the principle of the Buffington carriage and adding the product of his own inventive genius, he could evolve a carriage which he believed would answer. Time passed. Crozier completed his plan and type, and, after laborious and continuous application, he reported to the War Department. The War Department—and I will put it in the RECORD—considered it of importance, sufficiently so that the then Secretary of War in his annual report complimented the country and complimented the Department upon having evolved the best carriage in the world.

The Secretary of War, in his annual report for the year 1894, writes as follows:

> The establishment of type disappearing gun carriages for 8-inch and 10-inch guns, invented by officers of the Ordnance Corps, and believed to be unequaled for rapidity and simplicity of action by any carriage elsewhere in use, is a notable achievement of the year. This problem solved, the armament of our harbors may now be prosecuted as rapidly as means are available.
> At the date of the last annual report of the Department a selection of a type carriage for 8 and 10 inch guns was expected within a few months. Since then the 8-inch Buffington-Crozier disappearing carriage has been tried, with results, as stated by the Board of Ordnance, "exceeding for rapidity and smoothness of operation the most sanguine expectations of this board." The carriage is the combined invention of Colonel Buffington and Captain Crozier, of the Ordnance Department, and reflects credit on the inventive skill of American officers.
> It is a satisfactory solution of one of the most difficult problems which has confronted military science. I concur in the recommendation that liberal appropriations be made for the manufacture of these carriages for service, so that expenditures for guns of this caliber and emplacements prepared for them may speedily be utilized.

The President of the United States considered the achievement important enough to merit a mention in his annual message. I ask to put the language in the RECORD.

The annual message of the President to Congress of December 7, 1896, makes the following reference:

> During the same year, immediately preceding the message referred to, the first modern gun carriage had been completed and 11 more were in process of construction. All but one were of the nondisappearing type. These, however, were not such as to secure necessary cover for the artillery gunners against the intense fire of modern machine, rapid-fire, and high-power guns.
> The inventive genius of ordnance and civilian experts has been taxed in designing carriages that would obviate this fault, resulting, it is believed, in the solution of this difficult problem.

It was brought to the notice of those abroad, and was complimented there by very many, from Krupp, the great gun maker, down; and still Mr. Crozier had no patent and asked for none. He asked for no interest and expected no benefits. But, Mr. President, at the suggestion of higher officers of the United States he applied for a patent, and was impelled, because he had used Buffington's patent as a foundation, to preserve in the patent Buffington's name. Therefore the patent came out in the name of Buffington and Crozier.

But there was no interest, there was nothing in common between Generals Buffington and Crozier in any way except as they were necessarily thrown together in this one connection. I do not understand that they have been in entire harmony all of the time upon all matters. Finally, the United States felt that it desired to protect itself against foreign countries. It could not patent the device at home or abroad and so Captain Crozier was appealed to to take out and secure the benefit of a patent to protect the United States, and he did so.

All of this to show you that it could not have been Crozier's original or later intention to make money upon his patent.

About this time Crozier was appointed a professor in the West Point Military Academy, and his commission was issued and sent to him. He was then a junior captain. His commission carried with it the pay and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel. It was a life position and one that after ten years gave him a colonel's position, with all its perquisites and with all the rights of retirement, but such was his love for his chosen work that he declined the promotion.

Now, for a small sum, and that only to cover expenses, etc., the rights abroad were sold to the Bethlehem Company. Why? To make money for the patentees? Not any more than to protect the United States. If the United States had a patent that it thought was better than any for a similar purpose in other countries, it was to its interest to protect itself with the patent rights, so that if other countries of the world should desire to use our type of carriage they should be compelled to pay a royalty charge for it, and citizens in this nation should get the benefit of it.

We had a duly organized Board of Ordnance and Fortification. This invention was under examination from time to time, and it is a curious fact, but a fact nevertheless, that the first four reports—and I will ask to insert them—were all of them, as I am informed, unanimously in favor of this particular gun carriage.

General Schofield was the chairman of the board at its first meetings, and joined in the favorable reports. At that time neither Crozier nor Buffington was a member of the board; in fact, there never has been at any one time but one member from the Ordnance Department.

And with all the changes on that board, the first four reports are unanimously in favor of this particular gun carriage. Upon the fifth and last report out of the 5 votes 3 voted against and 2 voted for a large and continued use of the Crozier carriage, and, curiously enough, that was the first board upon which either of the patentees had served.

I submit herewith the five reports referred to:

EXPRESSIONS OF THE BOARD OF ORDNANCE AND FORTIFICATION IN REGARD TO THE DISAPPEARING CARRIAGE.

[Report for period from date of organization of the board to October 24, 1891: Maj. Gen. J. M. Schofield, president; Col. Henry L. Abbott, Corps of Engineers; Col. Henry W. Closson, Fourth United States Artillery; Col. A. Mordecai, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and Mr. Byron M. Cutcheon, members, 1891.]

In these days of naval range finders, machine guns, small arms of wonderful precision, and smokeless powders, the handling of heavy guns, mounted upon ordinary barbette carriages on low sites, is certain to be productive of such destructive results as to forbid its being attempted.

[Report of board for year ending October 31, 1894: Maj. Gen. J. M. Schofield, president; Col. Henry L. Abbott, Corps of Engineers; Col. Henry W. Closson, Fourth United States Artillery; Maj. Frank H. Phipps, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and Mr. Byron M. Cutcheon, members, 1894.]

The 8-inch carriage of this type had been received at the proving ground prior to the last annual report, and was being assembled and mounted on that date.

Since then it has passed a most satisfactory test at the hands of the Ordnance Board, exceeding for rapidity and smoothness of operation the most sanguine expectations of this board. This is an absolutely new type of disappearing carriage, the result of the combined inventions of Colonel Buffington, United States Ordnance Department, and Captain Crosier, Ordnance Department. It is a strictly American invention. Although of an entirely novel type, never before subjected to trial, it passed successfully through its test without so much as the breakage of a bolt, or any accident whatever. Only slight alterations in the recoil mechanism were required. The board regards this as a remarkable record. This is a front pintle carriage and traverses through 180 degrees.

* * * * * * *

The board recommends that liberal appropriations be made, so that the expenditure for guns of this caliber and emplacements therefor, already made, may be speedily utilized.

Ten-inch Crozier-Buffington disappearing carriage: This carriage, which was in process of fabrication at the date of last report, has been completed, assembled on its platform at Sandy Hook, and fully tested and accepted during the year.

The carriage does not materially differ, except in proportions, from the 8-inch carriage. Only slight modifications were required, especially in the hydraulic cylinders for checking recoil, in order to make it work satisfactorily. Like the 8-inch carriage of this type, the test has been completed without accident and to the entire satisfaction of the board.

[Report of board for year ending October 31, 1897: Maj. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, president; Col. Royal T. Frank, First United States Artillery; Col. Peter C. Hains, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Maj. Frank H. Phipps, Ordnance Department, United States Army; and Mr. Joseph H. Outhwaite, members, 1897.]

The test of this carriage (12-inch) is nearly completed, and it has proven an unqualified success. The development of this carriage is considered by the board as a decided advance, as it enables the Government to mount its heaviest guns under cover without resorting to such expensive devices as the gun-lift battery and armored turrets, which were considered the only solution of the problem a few years ago.

[Report of board for year ending October 31, 1898: Maj. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, president; Col. Royal T. Frank, First United States Artillery; Col. Peter C. Hains, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Maj. Frank H. Phipps, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and Mr. Joseph H. Outhwaite, members, 1898.]

This carriage (12-inch) was completed at the Watertown Arsenal May 6, 1897. It has since passed a very satisfactory test at the proving ground, and has been issued to the service.

* * * For the 6-inch, the Chief of Ordnance proposed two mounts, a disappearing carriage of the Crozier-Buffington system and a pillar mount similar to that for the 5-inch, with a preference in favor of the former. As the pillar-mount system will be thoroughly tested with the 5-inch gun, the board decided to test the Crozier-Buffington with the 6-inch.

If sufficient rapidity of fire can be obtained with this design, its advantages are obvious. The pillar mount, though under cover of the parapet when not firing, is necessarily exposed in action. The gun detachment is somewhat protected by the gun shield, but this is, of course, inadequate against large-caliber guns. With the disappearing system the gun is only above the parapet at the instant of firing and the gun detachment is completely protected, with the exception of the gun layer, whose head only is exposed in sighting. The sight is placed upon the carriage instead of upon the gun, and the gun can be laid while being loaded. It remains to be seen, when the two types are tested, whether or not the pillar mount will show any marked superiority in rapidity of aimed fire.

[Report of board for year ending October 31, 1900: Lieut. Gen. Nelson A. Miles, president; Brig. Gen. John M. Wilson, Corps of Engineers, United States Army; Brig. Gen. A. R. Buffington, Ordnance Department, United States Army; Col. John I. Rodgers, Fifth United States Artillery, and Mr. Thomas J. Henderson, members, 1900.]

The 6-inch rapid-fire gun on Buffington-Crozier mount (disappearing).—The tests of this gun and carriage have been completed during the year at the proving ground at Sandy Hook, N. J. As the result of these tests the board, at its meeting on October 5, 1900, took the following action:

While the mechanical operation of the carriage is satisfactory, it is the opinion of the board that, in the interests of economy in the construction of carriage and emplacements and of the general efficiency of the service, this carriage should not be adopted as a type, and it is recommended that no additional carriages of this type shall hereafter be procured for rapid-fire guns.

After giving the question of nondisappearing and disappearing carriages for 8, 10, 12, and 16 inch high-power guns for coast fortifications and the opinions of artillery officers careful consideration, it is the judgment of the Board of Ordnance and Fortification that it would be unwise and injudicious to locate any more guns on disappearing carriages than those now under process of construction on high or medium sites, and no more should be placed (than those now under process of construction) on low sites until the proportion of those to be placed in such fortifications shall have been limited to one-third of the total number to be so located.

Vote on above resolution of president of the board (proceedings of October 8, 1900): Ayes—General Miles, General Rodgers, General Henderson; noes—General Wilson, General Buffington.

The present Board of Ordnance and Fortification are in favor of the Buffington-Crozier disappearing gun carriages for certain sites.

Now, Mr. President, the engineers have charge of the new emplacements and of the selection of gun carriages therefor. There has been no evidence introduced here that the engineer force of the United States is opposed to disappearing gun carriages or disapproves of them. Certain officers of the artillery department who have the matter of the guns, when constructed, in charge were called upon by the Secretary of War for opinions and criticisms. Some 90 have expressed their opinion.

It will be observed that the questions were peculiarly worded, and were evidently made with a view of inviting criticism. They were made with a view of getting at the facts, not as to whether the gun carriages as then constructed were properly constructed, but, if not, in what respect were they not, and how could they be improved upon. I have gone through all of the letters written by those officers.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Department succeeded in getting criticism.

Mr. WARREN. They did. I should be very sorry to see this country ever arrive at a stage when its scientists and its experts should all agree, because whenever there is perfect agreement there is stagnation, and whenever stagnation comes the nation dies; we have no competition and no progress.

But, Mr. President, are we to follow the minority or are we to follow the majority? It has never been claimed that a disappearing carriage always is the thing for all sites and under all circumstances. I do not claim it; I do not think the Department claims it.

When we look through these questions, which invited criticism as to all sites, we find that quite a large majority is against the disappearing gun carriage as to high sites. We find, on the other side, that a very large majority is for these gun carriages upon all low sites. Therefore, if we are going to take the weight of evidence of our experts, from whom we have invited criticisms and answers, we are going to decide that the gun carriage is not always useful upon high sites, but that it is intensely useful upon low sites.

In arranging the names of the responding artillery officers according to the measure of their approbation or disapprobation, I have here a list in which I have the entire 91 answers, some of which were noncommittal. In arranging them according to the measure of their approbation it is safe to say that if you go down the list to the fortieth and forty-fifth or fiftieth, or more than half way down, and find them complimentary, then the majority is in favor of the carriage upon some site, either high or low.

The result of this computation I will ask to put in the RECORD, since the Senator from Vermont has put in his synopsis. I ask to put into the RECORD a summing up which will show for itself whether it is correct or incorrect, as all the names are given.

In looking over the synopsis and letters I do not find that the majority of evidence is against the disappearing carriage except on high sites. On the contrary, the evidence is very strongly in favor of disappearing carriages on all low sites.

I have information before me regarding opinions abroad of disappearing carriages, and I come to the conclusion from reading this information and from all the information I can get that all countries are interested in disappearing gun carriages, but a country which has its emplacements and guns all in position is not as anxious to change and put in disappearing carriages, even though it be an improvement, as a country which is engaged in building new fortifications.

I do not believe any other country has as vigorously pursued the problem of coast defenses and fortifications of late years as has the United States. This country long neglected its coasts, but finally, and I think very properly, took up vigorously the matter of its coast defenses and fortifications. It had a clear field, and it very properly went the world over to see if the desire expressed on every hand and in every country for a disappearing carriage was well founded in desirability or necessity, and to see if the proper carriage existed, and if such a carriage did not exist to find one or to try to invent and build one which would be satisfactory.

I presume the present carriage may not be as complete and satisfactory as we may yet see. This is an age of progress. We may find something which will be far better. But I do not believe there is necessity for condemning both the present carriage and the people who invented it until we find something better, or until we find some reason for such condemnation.

There have been letters and papers introduced here from those who extremely disapprove of the disappearing gun. One officer, Ruckman, who writes a letter which covers some eight pages of closely printed matter in Senate Doc. No. 336, this session, was quoted yesterday by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], and his letter went in the RECORD. As against that I desire to offer three letters—they are not long ones—from three distinguished officers who take an opposite view. The three letters taken together will not require as much space as Ruckman's occupied in the RECORD. All of these officers are peculiarly qualified, through experience, to pass judgment.

In the first place, I think I have had as much practical experience with both carriages as any other officer of artillery. At the breaking out of the war with Spain my battery was assigned to the five 10-inch B. L. rifles, mounted on disappearing carriages at Fort Winfield Scott, San Francisco. Three of these carriages were model 1894, two of model 1896. We were in camp just in rear of the guns for eight months, serving them four hours daily, except Sundays. Most of this time I was in command of a battalion of artillery serving the entire armament at Fort Scott, and thus had experience with the 12-inch B. L. rifles mounted on barbette carriages. During the period mentioned the 10-inch guns were frequently fired. At target practice I have witnessed the firing of the 12-inch guns on barbette carriages. For the last six months my battery has had charge of the entire armament of Fort Scott.

As a result of this experience I am totally in favor of the disappearing carriage for all sites—low, medium, and high.

In an action with a spirited naval antagonist I am confident the fire of the barbette gun will soon be silenced or kept down by the secondary armament of the ships, while the disappearing gun will continue its fire undisturbed. Nor will shields afford sufficient protection to prevent the silencing of the barbette guns.

As to the "mechanical complication" of the disappearing carriage as compared with the barbette carriage, this is not to my mind and in my experience what others allege. When the latter carriage is supplied with retraction gearing, as contemplated, it will, to a novice, appear much more complicated. The principal difference then between it and the former carriage will be the gun levers and counterweights, which in themselves are very simple and positive in their action, requiring no attention.

Guns mounted on the disappearing carriage are more rapidly fired than when mounted on the barbette carriage, caliber for caliber. Moreover, the personnel serving the latter will become played out from fatigue much sooner than will be the case with those serving the disappearing gun, caliber for caliber.

The barbette carriage certainly requires less attention in its care and preservation. This cuts no figure, however, for my battery, with 20 men short (on the average), takes care of five 10-inch rifles (disappearing), three 12-inch rifles (disappearing), five 10-inch rifles (barbette), three 8-inch rifles (disappearing), three 15-inch pneumatic guns, thirty-two 12-inch mortars, two 6-inch disappearing carriages, keeps all of the emplacements, drains, roadways, slopes, etc., in perfect order, drills twice a week at infantry drill, furnishes the guard for the entire armament, and prepared this entire armament and furnished the manning details for same in the recent test by you.

In my experience I have met with no difficulty in serving the disappearing carriage. To one who has had little or nothing to do with it the carriage looks complicated.

I consider the disappearing carriage a practical, serviceable mounting, not too complicated or delicate to be maintained in working order and not requiring more expenditure of labor or greater skill in serving it than can reasonably be expected of the personnel we are liable to have in the artillery service.

Yours, very truly,

SEDGWICK PRATT.

ON BOARD U. S. ARMY TRANSPORT MEADE,
At Sea, December 26, 1899.

* * * * * * *

I was on duty at Fort Wadsworth, N. Y., in 1896, when the first five of the carriages, model 1894, for 8-inch guns were mounted, and though I was not directly in charge of the work of mounting the guns, I assisted in this, and as these were the first mounted in service, so far as I knew, naturally took great interest in all stages of the work.

After these guns were mounted I was detailed as president of a board of officers, consisting of Lieut. F. S. Harlow, First Artillery; Lieut. I. N. Lewis, Second Artillery, and myself, to graduate the elevating circles of these guns and to report upon the condition and serviceability of the mounting. To the best of my recollection the board found all but one of the guns in practicable working order, except in regard to a few minor details. The unserviceability of this gun was due to defects in the platform.

* * * * * * *

During the summer of 1898 I was on duty at Kest West, Fla., and assisted in the mounting of two 8-inch guns on disappearing carriages, model 1894, and three 10-inch guns on carriage model 1896, besides a number of mortars and rapid-fire guns. The work of the mounting was in direct charge of Capt. C. H. McKinstry, Engineer Corps, who had as an assistant a Mr. Raybold, a machinist who had mounted a number of guns on disappearing carriages at other places. Under the supervision of Mr. Raybold no difficulty was experienced in assembling the carriages, and from what I thus saw and had already seen at Fort Wadsworth, of such work, I have not the slightest hesitation in stating that all necessary information for mounting guns on these carriages can be obtained from the pamphlets of instruction furnished by the Ordnance Department, when the ordinary mechanical knowledge which every officer of artillery should possess is considered.
